OUR friends who write for the "Corner" will confer a favor by remembering that for the convenience of compositors, proofreaders and editors the rule is to write on one side of the paper only. Several excellent contributions to "Aunt Marjorie's Corner" have recently been declined because the editor has not the time to copy them, and the printers cannot be required to set up long, crowded pages of foolscap written on both sides. Perhaps everybody does not know that, in order to save time, the manuscript in a printing-office is divided into small parts, technically called "takes," and several men are at work on an article at the same time. If the article is written on both sides of the paper, it is obvious that it cannot be cut up in this way, and must be given to only one persan to translate into type.

Please use black ink, not red, nor blue, nor green, nor a faint milky fluid, nor a pencil.

Write legibly. There is a positive immorality in writing so that your correspondent can with difficulty decipher your meaning.

Do not roll your manuscript. Fold it. Address it plainly, giving your full name, whether Madam or

Miss being indicated in brackets, and enclosing stamps for the return of your article if it prove unavailable.

Do not forget that the opportunity to say bright, helpful words to those who need them is afforded by "Aunt Marjorie's Corner," and that Aunt Marjorie herself, as hostess of the same, will give you a hearty welcome.

CHILDREN'S PORTFOLIO.

DEAR LITTLE HEADS: Far away, over the blue Pacific, in the shadow of the great mountain Fusi-yama, there is a school where the girls, at first sight, look very much like sisters. For they all have dark eyes and dark hair, and they are dressed precisely alike in dresses of soft, dark stuff, made very simply with straight full skirts, with waists brought in a sort of crossed-kerchief style over the pretty plump shoulders and fastened by a broad, loosely-tied sash. Their teachers, some of whom have come from America to instruct these little Japanese girls, say that they are very gentle and obedient, and that they learn very quickly. And I am of the same opinion, at least about the learning, for, knowing how hard some little English-speaking children find it to write compositions, I am often surprised at the progress these Japanese girls make in writing out their ideas, not in their own tongue, but in ours. Just think how hard it is for you, Amy or Allison, to write your French exercises, or to compose a theme in Latin or in German, and then consider the trouble it must be to a Japanese girl to write her essay in pure, good, really beautiful English.

Well, one day some weeks ago, there were sorrowful faces in the school under the shadow of the mountain. One of the girls, a dear girl, and a great favorite, one, too, who in another year would be graduated so that she could teach her own people if she chose, had received a letter from home. In it her father told her very sorrowfully that she must bid good-by to the dear foreign teachers, and the lady who taught her pretty Japanese etiquette, how to pour tea daintily, and entertain visitor , and talk in sweet silvery little phrases, and also to the Chinese professor who drilled her in Chinese classics. She could not attend any longer the Bible class that she was so fond of, nor join in the morning and evening hymn. Father was very sorry. But he had so little money this year, and he had met with losses, and he could not any longer pay for his daughter at the missionary's school.

They girls felt very sorry. They held a meeting about it after school. Then they came to the principal with a proposal. It was this:

"If you," said they, "will teach our schoolmate for nothing for the rest of the time till she finishes the course, we, out of our own pocket-money, will pay for her board and all other expenses."

As it costs just sixty dollars a year to educate a pupil in this school, the girls were undertaking to raise thirty dollars out of their own little pocket-money. If you knew how very little they have, you would understand how many sacrifices they must make in order to raise this amount. But they could not let their friend lose her Christian education.

Now, I merely wish to ask the children who read this "Portfolio," if they do not desire to be as self-denying for Christ's sake as are the dear young girls in the Isaac Ferris Seminary? What are you doing for Jesus? AUNT MARJORIE.

In Memoriam.

THE readers of THE CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER may often have noticed in the Home Department bright little articles for the children and occasional puzzles for the "Little Heads," under the initials "K. M. S."

If these same little children had knocked at the door of the writer's little home, which she called "The Wren's Nest," they would have met with a sunny welcome, and the first visit would certainly not have been the last, for children know their friends, and the genial, happy mistress of this little home was the children's friend.

Her heart was large enough to hold many no longer children, and on every side throng memories of kind words spoken, kind deeds done to all who came within her reach, and her circle was a large one.

But now the kind voice is stilled, the kind pen has dropped from the fingers; and there is true mourning in many hearts.

Mrs. Stremmell was a member of a sister church not of our denomination; but her deep love for her own church only opened her heart the more to all Christians, and when a copy of this paper was given her she became interested in it, and from time to time sent the fruit of her busy pen to entertain its little readers.

The summons came suddenly. "I do not feel well to-night, but I shall be better in the morning," and in the morning she was in the land "where the inhabitant shall not say, I am sick."

In times of sorrow and bereavement, what great comfort lies in the thought that the seeming end is only "the end of the beginning." I. T. W.

ASTORIA, April, 1886.

Blind Henry Fawcett.

HENRY FAWCETT started as a boy with the ambition to enter the House of Commons. This aspiration he regarded as an inspiration from God, for he looked upon the position as a trust. He coveted it not to gratify any ambition for distinction and power, but that he might serve his country by removing from millions of his countrymen the degradation of ignorance. One day, after he had graduated from the university, Fawcett and his father went out shooting. The son was in advance, some thirty yards, when a covey of partridges rose between him and his father, who fired at a bird which was in line with his son. The bird was shattered by the charge, but two pellets passed through the tinted spectacles of the son, one through each glass, entered the eyes, and embedded themselves behind them. In an instant Henry Fawcett was blind for life.

His first thought was, not that he should be forever excluded from the House of Commons, but that he should never again see the lovely view which he had just been admiring. The father was broken-hearted, for the son was the pride of his heart, and he had made the youth's ambition his own.

The son, however, was not crushed by the terrible calamity. Though cast into utter darkness at the morning of his life, young Fawcett looked the calamity steadily in the face. He resigned himself to the inevitable, but he determined that the calamity should not make him abandon any duty he could perform, nor persuade him to give up the ambition of his life. From that moment his blindness lost half its terrors. It remained an impediment, but never became an obstruction. The man was crippled, but though he limped, he kept step with the most stalwart.

As a Fellow of the University he resided at Cambridge, and was elected its professor of Political Economy. His verbal memory was weak, and he seldom trusted himself to make a quotation, but facts and figures were grasped by him with such precision as to fit him for his professional work. He became an authority in what Carlyle calls the "Dismal Science," and a popular lecturer with the undergraduates.

Seven years after the accident, the blind, poor, unknown young man sat in the House of Commons as a member for Brighton. Fifteen years of distinguished service as a Liberal member, wherein he displayed remarkable ability as a debater, caused Mr. Gladstone to appoint him Postmaster-General. Immediately he broke away from the traditions of officialism, by making it apparent that the nation did not exist to maintain the Postmaster-General, but that his office was created and that he was put in it to serve the nation.

Prime ministers had regarded the post-office as a source of revenue. Mr. Fawcett insisted that this large arm of the government should do better work than increase the revenue; it should diffuse knowl edge, expand trade, increase prosperity, encourage family correspondence, and facilitate thrift.

During the four years and a half that this blind man ran the great engine, he made it deliver parcels, receive the savings of the poor, insure their lives, and pay them annuities. He lowered the charges on telegrams,—the telegraph being a government monopoly in Great Britain,—and greatly increased the use of postal orders.

He died in office, and the "common people," imitating the Queen and Mr. Gladstone, sent to Mrs. Fawcett written expressions of their great loss.

This is an age of biographies, but we know none more stimulating than the "Life of Henry Fawcett," by Leslie Stephen. If any boy is depressed by the fact that he is poor, unknown, and without friends, let him read this narrative of one who, though weighted with blindness at the outset, made for himself a noble, because beneficent, career.—Youth's Companion.

The Little Girl of Gettysburg.*

'TWAS Gettysburg's last day.
The dead and wounded lay
On trampled fields and ridges battle-torn,
Among the outer posts,
Around the guarded hosts,
Rode Hancock, watchful, on the fated morn.

And lo! a little child,
With eyes and tresses wild,
Close to the lines had strayed, and met him there,
And tightly to her breast
A heavy load she prest—
A musket!—all her slender strength could bear.

"My brave and pretty dear,
Tell me, how come you here
Upon the field, before the fight is done?"
Then, at her lisped reply,
Tears dimmed the General's eye:
"My papa's dead, but here's my papa's gun."

A Knowing Dog.

THE following story of the way in which a dog outwitted his master appeared first in a Scottish journal, and several persons bore witness to the truth of the narrative:

A gentleman in Glasgow owned a very intelligent Newfoundland dog. He accompanied his master wherever he went, and was his inseparable companion in his visits to church. One evening the gentleman went out to visit a neighbor. The dog attended him. It was quite late when the gentleman started for home, and to his surprise his dog could not be found. After the family had retired to bed there was a great noise in the kitchen. It was supposed that burglars were robbing the house. Soon there was a crash and a smash like the breaking in a window, and then all was still. The morning revealed the mystery. The dog had fallen asleep under the table. He was sensible that his master had gone home, and the noise heard was the attempt of the dog to make his escape. As there was no other way to get out the sagacious animal went through the window, taking the glass and frame with him.

It was a long time before his master visited that house again. When he did his dog accompanied him, and the animal found his way through the open door of the kitchen to his old hiding-place under the table. It was late when the master started for home. But neither his hat nor cane could be found. After a long search the dog was discovered fast asleep under the table; one paw was in his master's hat, the other resting on his master's cane. How he obtained possession of these articles no one could tell. He remembered his last visit to the place, and how scurvily he was treated. The sagacious creature resolved not to be left behind the next time. He knew that his master could not go home without his hat and cane, and that he would be quite likely to be awakened when his owner got ready to walk. His plans were acutely laid, and if he had possessed reason he could not have done better.

Our Church.

TUESDAY, May 4th. Rev. Dr. Van Cleef continues in a very critical condition.

....The First Church of Brooklyn, N. Y., last Sabbath held its last services in the building it has occupied since 1835. Rev. Dr. D. N. Vanderveer delivered an historical sermon in the morning. Rev. Dr. Willets, a former pastor, was present and made an address. A farewell communion service was held in the evening.

....Rev. Edwin F. See preached his farewell sermon to the Third Church of Albany, N. Y., last Sabbath.

Questions.

THE constant appeals of the Secretaries and Treasurers of our Church Boards for more money and more interest in our Church work, has led the writer to ask, Would not the contributions of our churches be larger to-day if years ago they had begun with the children and taught them to give regularly and with some system, and had instructed them in the needs of their own Church? When we say "our members take little or no interest in this or that cause," is it not a fair question to ask, How were they brought up? What were their early influences? Were they taught to love their own denomination and to give for its extension, or were they permitted to divert their offerings to some passing interest? If it is found that we have been remiss in this respect, let us begin now to train up our children, our young men and maidens, in the way they should give, so that when they are old er they will not depart from right giving.

Then again, are we as a Church paying as much attention to this source of income as we should? Ought not our Mission Boards to receive more than they do from the 30,236 scholars in our Sunday-schools?

There are 758 schools connected with our Reformed Church. Do all their contributions flow in the direction of our denominational work? Last year these schools gave $4,185.98 to the Board of Domestic Missions, which is an average (for a whole year) of only $5.52 from each of the 758 schools. No one will be disposed to say that this is a fair estimate of their ability. It is stated that there are scores of Sunday-schools which never give to the home work at all, because they never hear anything about it. Many of these would have sent in their mites had the opportunity been presented and interest excited by giving the proper information.

Below is an example of what might be done, which would add about $15,000 to the present income of the Board, and develop a church strength which we have never before known. The school is by no means the strongest in our Church, but it takes the right method.

"Go thou and do likewise."

SABBATH-SCHOOL OF METUCHEN, N. J.

Collection in Home Missionary boxes, by classes, on the first Sabbath of each month, for one year, commencing March 1st, 1885: Mr. Freeman Edgar's class, $1.58; Mrs. C. S. Edgar, infant class, $3.31; Miss Clara Martin's class, 56 cents; Mr. William O. Craig's class, $1.56; Mrs. S. C. Cruickshank's class, $1.06; Miss Rebecca Mundy's class, $1.18; Miss Fanny Wendover's class, $4.24; Mr. John Cornell's class, $6.29; Miss Clara Edgar's class, $1.55; Mrs. R. H. Wilson's class, $6.30; Miss Tillie Hahn's class, $1.37. Total, $29. For Domestic Missions, by order of the School. R. H. WILSON, Supt.

Why will not the pastors and superintendents and teachers take up and agitate this matter and see what can be done?

Try to get one collection each month for our Foreign Missions and one collection each month for Domestic Missions.

Let us all try it just for one year and see how it succeeds.

Financial.

TUESDAY, May 4th.

THE value of the imports of merchandise at this port last week was reckoned at $8,917,325, and of exports at $6,568,682. Since Jan. 1st imports have amounted to $145,565,389, or 16 1-2 millions more than in the same time last year, and exports to $95,257,007, or 12 1-4 millions less than last year. The difference to our disadvantage is nearly 29 millions of dollars. The export of specie amounted last week to $1,951,273, the larger part being bought on French account. Sterling exchange sold yesterday at $4.87 for 60 day bills and $4.89 for demand. It is said that securities were sold on European account, the holders being fearful of the results of the strikes here. We are holding Europe's supply of food. Stocks on the other side of the Atlantic are not what they were usually a few years ago. The transport is now so frequent, regular and rapid that European dealers buy little more than their necessities require. We are carrying the surplus. The only surplus of food of real importance in the world is here. The growing crop here is in a promising condition, and in Europe the weather recently has improved. The prospect at present for an improvement in our foreign exchanges is not as bright as we would like to have it.

The Associated Banks last week reduced loans $244,400, lost in specie $1,765,700, gained in legal tenders $131,000, lost in deposits $2,396,000, and reduced the surplus of reserve $1,297,700, making it $12,025,850. The U. S. Treasury continues to add to its stock of gold. It gained in gold during April over 4 1-2 millions. The public debt was reduced by $10,965,387. Of the called bonds $5,856,795 have not been presented for redemption. The bonded debt is now $1,230,365,462, against $1,240,681,462 on April 1st. Comparing last week's statement with that of a year ago, the debt, less cash on hand, has been reduced $90,714,997. Money rose last week temporarily to 3 and 4 per cent, but the average rate on call was 2 1-2 per cent. The rate on call yesterday was 2 to 3 per cent. The general rate on good paper and on time is 5 per cent. Ample security still obtains loans at 4 per cent.

The Stock Market is rather weaker, being affected by the doubtful issue of the strikes. Buying by outsiders is moderate. But first rate investment securities are not to be had in large lots at any material concession and some steadily increase in value. There is no eagerness to sell what is really valuable.

Foreign grain markets are reported firm. Here the unsettled condition of the labor market and the promise of the coming harvest affect prices. Quotations yesterday were: Wheat here 91, in Chicago 78 1-8; corn here 46 1 8, in Chicago 35 1-8; oats here 36 5 8, in Chicago 29 3 8. No decided improvement in provisions. Quotations for cotton yesterday were: May 9.24–25; June 9 33; July 9.43–44; August 9.53. The demand for hay is light and the supply abundant. Quotations yesterday were: Choice timothy 85 to 90, clover mixed 70 to 72; No. 1 rye straw 90 to 92 1-2, oat straw 40 to 50, wheat straw 40 to 55 cents.

Trade is restricted by the strikes but the clearances continue larger than those of last year.

The report is current that the recent exports of gold to France are for American subscriptions to the new French 3 per cent loan. The French bonds are offered at 82; will yield 3.65 per cent, are likely to rise in value.

News of the Week.

Traces of the missing Mr. Nourse have been found by his brother, visiting Kenilworth Castle....A strike for eight hours work will be begun at Washington on Monday. If there is not an agreement before Monday about 10,000 men will stop work. ....The strike in the sugar houses in Williamsburgh still going on....Great anxiety felt in Chicago on account of the eight hour movement. The railroad companies have decided not to grant it....A large fire took place in Baltimore yesterday. Several large firms were burned out, the loss amounting to $600,000. The cause of the fire is unknown .... Arcade bill amended and passed by the Legislature of this State ... The trades union leaders in Pittsburg oppose the Knights of Labor... Large furniture house and book publishing and stationery house burned in San Francisco. Loss $750,000. The stock of Bancroft's histories of Pacific States burned, and sheets of unpublished volumes.

MONDAY, 3.—Meetings held in England in opposition to Home Rule....It is reported that all the Foreign Ministers in Greece except Sir Horace Rumbold, the British Minister, have received instructions to the effect that the reply of the Greek Government to the ultimatum of the Powers is insufficient ...Greece's decree ordering the disarming of the troops will appear to-morrow....The Prussian Government is preparing to act against strikes....Shorter hours will be demanded in many trades after May 1st in New York city. It is expected that at least 7,500 men will go on a strike to-day....The sugar house strikes nearly over....Third avenue cars running again. ....Eight thousand men will strike in St. Louis to-day; the result of trying to enforce the eight-hour law....Most of the railroad freight houses in Chicago closed on account of the strikes....President Porter, of Yale College, celebrated the semi-centenary of his ordination as a minister....The Pan-Electric Committee have a good deal of difficulty in securing the services of Mr. George Jones, of the N. Y. Times, as a witness ...The exports from a part of Northern Germany to America during the first quarter of 1886 amounted to $11,250,000 against $8,875,000 during the same period in 1885.

TUESDAY, 4.—Strike on Missouri Pacific system said to be ended. Thousands of workingmen and women stopped work yesterday in Chicago, Baltimore, Washington, Boston, Grand Rapids, Mich., and other cities, demanding eight hours work a day and higher wages....The old Board of Excise and the new one chosen by the Mayor are both in session in this city, each claiming to be the legal Board....Savannah, Ga., celebrated yesterday the centennial of the Chatham Artillery; nearly 6,000 men in procession, great crowd of visitors, Jefferson Davis present....Three young firemen arrested in Schenectady, N. Y., as incendiaries....Slight earthquake reported from Ohio ...Greece adheres to its reply to the ultimatum of the Powers, and the Ministers were said to be preparing to embark....Mr. Gladstone, saying that he is too old to engage in a speaking campaign and must save his strength to use in the Commons, prints an address to the Midlothian voters. The main point is that his bill is the only plan offered, its opponents being divided and undecided, and that if Home Rule is not granted now, as soon as a time of trial comes a worse bill may be granted from sheer necessity....Great Britain and Germany agree on a dividing line between their seizures, present and future, of other people's territory in the Southern Pacific.

Our readers will confer a favor upon the publishers of this paper and, perhaps, find it to their own advantage if, when answering an advertisement found in these columns, mention is made that it was seen in THE CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER.

Market Report.

Review of the New York Market for Butter. Cheese, etc. Reported by DAVID W. LEWIS & Co., Produce Commission Merchants, 49 Pearl St., New York.
Commission on Butter, Eggs, Poultry, etc., is five per cent; Flour, Grain, etc., 2½ per cent.
Marking-plates furnished when desired.

NEW YORK, May 1, 1886.

BUTTER.—Receipts for the week, 27,579 pks.; exports none.

The season in the dairy districts of this State is two to three weeks earlier than usual, and butter from the Western Reserve and Chautauqua districts begins to show some grass. At this time, just between hay and grass, quite a proportion of the arrivals are mixed in color and variable in quality, and with large arrivals of Western butter prices have been lower. Selections of fancy dairy tubs are selling at 22a24c. After leaving these, fine dairy butter sold in line at 20c., and rejections were offered at 15 a18c., according to quality, considerable of it being carried over unsold. We quote:

New butter, fancy creamery	—	@24
do do dairy (selections)	22	@23
do good to fine	17	@20
do poor to common	12	@15

CHEESE.—Receipts for the week, 8,832 boxes; exports 16,538 boxes.

The season being so early has an influence upon the market for old cheese, and holders have offered them at somewhat reduced prices. New cheese are beginning to arrive and full creams are selling mostly at 9a10c. Skimmed cheese are overdone and present low prices do not pay for making. We quote:

Choice full cream cheese	9½	@10¼
Good useful cheese	8	@ 9¼
Skimmed cheese	1½	@ 4½

EGGS.—Receipts for the week were 16,669 bbls. and 14,356 cases.

The market seems to be sluggish and inactive. 50 bbls. Western fresh receipts sold on 'Change at 12c. Ohio cases, cases included, were offered at 12c., and had 11¾c. bid.

MAPLE SUGAR in large supply, light demand and lower prices. We quote:

Choice new sugar	7	@ 8
Dark sugar	6	@ 6½
Syrup, per gallon can	—	@75

Life, Heal h, Elegance, Durability.

This is the motto of Dr. Scott's Electric Corsets. These admirable corsets should be examined by every lady in the land. There is a great demand for them by all who have ever used them. In wearing these corsets it is claimed that all drugs or medicines of any kind can be entirely done away with, while they are elegant in shape, and fit to the figure beautifully, and are every way comfortable. Over three thousand families in the city of New York alone are now wearing them. They are double stitched and never are known to rip. They are made of English sateen in white and dove color; sizes, eighteen to thirty inches, abdominal up to twenty-five inches; all fine goods and exceedingly durable. The result is noticed very quickly after beginning to wear them, as the electro-magnetism acts quickly, generally the first week, but more frequently the first day, and often during the first hour they are put on. They will remove any ache, pain, or other disagreeable feeling from which one may suffer. They cause the mind to become active, tone up the nerves and bring about a proper circulation. All this may seem strange to the unbelieving—as there are many such in the world—and yet when one stops to think how universal electric treatment has become, it does not seem so wonderful after all. These electro-magnetic corsets are constructed on scientific principles, and therefore cannot fail to impart an exhilarating, health-giving current to the whole system. These corsets do not differ in appearance from all other corsets. The magnetism is conducted through the flat steel in place of the ordinary corset steel. The corsets are all equally charged, differing only in quality and design. Neither are they expensive. In fact they are remarkably cheap. Send for a sample and judge for yourself. Dr. Scott is reliable and you will get just what is represented.

In hundreds of cases, Hood's Sarsaparilla, by purifying and enriching the blood, has proven a potent remedy for rheumatism. Hence, if you suffer the pains and aches of this disease, it is fair to assume that Hood's Sarsaparilla will cure you. Give it a trial.

A revivifying of nature's latent forces occurs every spring. At this time, better than at any other, the blood may be cleansed from the humors which infest it. The best and most popular remedy to use for this purpose is Ayer's Compound Extract of Sarsaparilla.

Ayer's Hair Vigor keeps the hair soft and pliant, imparts to it the lustre and freshness of youth, causes it to grow luxuriantly, eradicates Dandruff, cures all scalp diseases, and is the most cleanly of all hair preparations.

AYER'S Hair Vigor has given me perfect satisfaction. I was nearly bald for six years, during which time I used many hair preparations, but without success. Indeed, what little hair I had, was growing thinner, until I tried Ayer's Hair Vigor. I used two bottles of the Vigor, and my head is now well covered with a new growth of hair. —Judson B. Chapel, Peabody, Mass.

HAIR that has become weak, gray, and faded, may have new life and color restored to it by the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. My hair was thin, faded, and dry, and fell out in large quantities. Ayer's Hair Vigor stopped the falling, and restored my hair to its original color. As a dressing for the hair, this preparation has no equal.—Mary N. Hammond, Stillwater, Minn.

VIGOR, youth, and beauty, in the appearance of the hair, may be preserved for an indefinite period by the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. A disease of the scalp caused my hair to become harsh and dry, and to fall out freely. Nothing I tried seemed to do any good until I commenced using Ayer's Hair Vigor. Three bottles of this preparation restored my hair to a healthy condition, and it is now soft and pliant. My scalp is cured, and it is also free from dandruff.—Mrs. E. R. Foss, Milwaukee, Wis.

Ayer's Hair Vigor,

Sold by Druggists and Perfumers.

PERFECT SAFETY, prompt action, and wonderful curative properties, easily place Ayer's Pills at the head of the list of popular remedies for Sick and Nervous Headaches, Constipation, and all ailments originating in a disordered Liver.

I have been a great sufferer from Headache, and Ayer's Cathartic Pills are the only medicine that has ever given me relief. One dose of these Pills will quickly move my bowels, and free my head from pain.—William L. Page, Richmond Va.

Spiritual Resurrection.

"Like as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life."—ROM. 6:4.

IN the semblance of His trials
I would be tried;
In the likeness of His dying
Be crucified;
I would have my carnal nature
Nailed to the cross;
I would have all selfish feeling
Know naught but loss;
I would have my pride of self-will Shed many a tear;
I would have unholy passions
Pierced with a spear;
I would bear about the dying
Of every sin,
That the life of Jesus may be
Where shame hath been;
I would see a resurrection
Out of living death;
I would have the life eternal
Quicken by His breath;
Not like the fabled Phœnix
Would I arise
On golden-colored pinion
Cleaving the skies,
But like the Christ of Judah,
Man without sin,
Life full of grace and goodness
Growing within,
Out of the depth of ashes
Where sin hath died,
Where the old evil nature
Was crucified:
Thence would I see my spirit
Rise out of strife,
And walk this world of joy in Newness of life. —Rev. Giles P. Hawley.

Exordium Remotum.

EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER: Your correspondent, W. L. B., in his interesting communication which appeared April 14th, mentions the use of the exordium remotum in public worship. This feature of church service is a "what is it?" to the experience of most of us; but if a specimen of it from the writings of a venerated and distinguished minister would interest your readers, you are welcome to this which follows.

Dr. James Spencer Cannon, pastor of the Six-Mile-Run Church, 1797–1826, and thereafter Professor of Ecclesiastical History and Pastoral Theology in the Seminary at New Brunswick, copied many of his sermons into books, which he presented as keepsakes to his children. From one of these volumes, which belonged to his son, the late William W. Cannon of New Brunswick, the extract is taken and there are only two of these eleven sermons which are thus completely introduced by an exordium remotum and an exordium proximum. H. D. B. M.

"ELIJAH'S CONFLICT WITH THE PRIESTS OF BAAL.

PART I.

1 Kings 18 Chap. 17–18–19.

EXOR: REMO:—The Scripture "is profitable for instruction, doctrine and reproof, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto every good work." In the Sacred Scriptures there are express revelations from God of many momentous truths: truths which our own understanding however much improved, co'd not have discovered: in the Scriptures there are many direct admonitions and reproofs which speak with no little power to the mind that is under the influence of Wrong Passions and to the heart that is lulled to sleep thro' the deceitful operations of sin. But in the Scriptures there is also much history: history which while it is essentially necessary to prove both the existence and the accomplishment of Prophecy and to answer other important ends, serves to convey to us indirectly "much instruction in righteousness"—much doctrine and much reproof.

Accordingly there is much benefit to be derived from the Study of Scripture History: for, it is a history in which the Supreme Being appears in his Majesty and Greatness as well as in his Infinite Condescension—a history in which we perceive truth and righteousness in a perpetual conflict with error and depravity; and in which we discover "a precious seed of grace"—a little company of men and women who after adorning their religion on earth, wing their flight away to a better country—the Habitation of Purity and Peace.

Let us then keep in mind that the Historical parts of the Old Testament Scriptures are necessary to the perfection of the Sacred Scriptures, so far as they exhibit a scheme of redemption—and can never be read by us in the Spirit of Prayer without Profit.

TEXTUS.—1 Kings XXIII. 17, 18–19.

"And it came to pass" etc.

Then follows the "EXOR: PROX:—Of ancient Sacred History, the Chapter now before us forms a very interesting portion. It exhibits to our views an eminent Prophet of the Lord standing almost alone in the profession of true religion and engaged in a conflict with the numerous foes of that religion led on by men high in power and armed with the sword. It presents before our sight an extraordinary interposition of the Supreme Being to give renewed evidence of his own existence and Power and Holiness in an age of great darkness and at a time when truth lay prostrate in the streets.

Let us then ponder this piece of History which, as evidently appears from the first verse of the text, stands connected with events which had occurred before: events which made Ahab the king regard Elijah the Prophet with feelings of deep resentment: 'for, it came to pass,' says the Sacred Historian, 'when Ahab saw Elijah, that Ahab said unto him, Art thou he that troubleth Israel?'"

This sermon is marked "S. M. R. 1823—Rutg. Coll. June 1831."

The Invitation Society.

"Come, see a man that told me all the things that ever I did; is not this the Christ?"—JOHN 4:29.

SOME years ago, a man residing in one of our cities was deeply impressed and grieved by seeing multitudes who neglected public worship, and he determined to make the effort to induce some of the Sabbath-breakers to frequent the house of God. It required some little effort at first, but he overcame his timidity. One Lord's Day evening he went forth with his holy purpose, and, meeting a young man who did not appear to be on his way to a place of worship, he respectfully addressed him, got into conversation with him, and persuaded the stranger to accompany him to worship, and, as an inducement offered him a seat in his own pew. Succeeding in this case he was emboldened and encouraged to proceed in this line of Christian activity and usefulness. And now, mark what a blessed result; he was the means of leading one hundred young men to become stated attendants at the sanctuary, many of whom have become truly converted to God.

A minister of the Gospel mentioned this at one of his prayer-meetings, when the idea was caught up by some persons present, who at once said, "How admirable a plan this is for doing good." A little association was immediately formed, called the "Invitation Society." In sixteen months, two hundred persons were persuaded by eight or ten of its agents, no longer to forsake the assembling of themselves in the house of prayer. One of those agents, an earnest Christian in humble life, devoted himself to this work, and was the means of bringing forty to hear the Word of life.—Words and Weapons.

International Sunday-School Lesson.

BY REV. JOHN C. VAN DEVENTER.

May 16th.—"The Nobleman's Son."—John 4: 43–54.

Golden Text.—"Jesus saith unto him, Go thy way; thy son liveth."—JOHN 4:50.

CENTRAL TRUTH.—"Who healeth all thy diseases."—Ps. 103:3.

INTRODUCTION.

THE number of miracles recorded by John is small compared with that found in the other Gospels, and the principle of his selection seems to have been, to use those which most conspicuously illustrated his theme, the Divinity of the Word. The cure now under consideration, being performed at a distance, showed that Jesus could exercise power beyond the sphere of His bodily presence.

THE LESSON.

I. THE RETURNING PROPHET.—VS. 43–46.

V. 43.—"Now after two days he departed thence." These days must have seemed all too short for the eager inhabitants of Sychar, who were for once enjoying the religious privileges granted to the Jews But Jesus seldom tarried long in one place. "He went about doing good." There were suffering bodies to relieve and waiting souls to be blessed in His own country.

V. 44.—"For Jesus himself testified, that a prophet hath no honor in his own country." The precise reference of this expression in this place is hard to determine, but the most natural explanation appears to be that Jesus intended to give the reason for not beginning His public ministry in Galilee. When He had made somewhat of a reputation in Judea, then He could return to His own country with some expectation of attention on the part of a suspicious people. This idea is confirmed by the statement in the next verse.

V. 45.—"The Galileans received him, having seen all the things that he did at Jerusalem at the feast." The word "Received" implies a looking for His coming and pleasure when He arrived. They were curious to see and hear Him; eager to have Him work miracles in their behalf; and ready to take to themselves some share in His fame. Undoubtedly there were some who, with purer motives, were awaiting His coming, who afterwards attached themselves to Him as His faithful followers.

V. 46.—"So Jesus came again into Cana of Galilee." He does not seem to have regarded Nazareth as His home any longer, and some have supposed that His family had removed from that village to Cana or Capernaum. His former visit to this place, and the miracle wrought on that occasion, helped to secure a welcome for Him.

II. THE PLEADING FATHER.—VS. 46–49.

V. 46.—"There was a certain nobleman whose son was sick at Capernaum." This nobleman has been thought to be Chuza, Herod's steward, whose wife, Joanna, is found among the honorable women who attended the travels of Jesus, and ministered to Him of their substance.

V. 47.—"Besought him that he would come down and heal his son." It is unfair to compare the request of this father with that of the Centurion, who did not wish to trouble Jesus to come to his house. It is very probable that the officer knew the facts connected with this case, and so knew that Jesus was able to heal at a distance. The nobleman's faith was genuine, although not brought out so strongly. He is the first one whose coming to Jesus with such a request is recorded, and we must expect a less striking expression of faith in such a case.

V. 48.—"Except ye see signs and wonders ye will not believe." We cannot believe that Jesus intended this as a rebuke to the father for want of faith. It seems impossible that a parent could be impelled by curiosity under such circumstances, and upon such an errand. It is better to regard this as a test of the father's persistence.

V. 49.—"Sir, come down ere my child die." The father has no thought for miracles as signs and wonders, he thinks only of his dying boy, and of this strange prophet, who may have power over life and death. Without waiting to answer the words of Christ he presses his request. The quality of his faith is seen in his persistence.

III. THE RESTORED SON.—VS. 50–54.

V. 50.—"Go thy way, thy son liveth." What strange words were these for the prophet to utter. Had not Elisha's staff proved ineffective without his presence, and could this man's word be of quickening power? If He could thus heal at a word, the inference was clear, this is none other than the Son of God. "The man believed the word that Jesus had spoken." A word so strange and difficult to believe!—who will say that his faith was weak and unworthy? "He went his way." Proving his faith by obedience, asking neither sign nor explanation, "simply trusting."

V. 51.—"As he was now going down." His journey up from Capernaum to Cana had been hurried and anxious; his return was leisurely and calm. The peace of God was filling his heart. "His servants met him, and told him, saying, Thy son liveth." Those at home watching over the sick child, had, perhaps, failed to recognize in the rapid recovery any supernatural interference, and simply thought that it would be unnecessary to trouble Jesus any further.

V 52.—"Then inquired he of them the hour when he began to amend." In his own mind, doubtless, the answer was fully anticipated. Still he was hardly prepared for the news of the immediate recovery of his son; he thought that he must have rallied slowly from the low state in which he had left him. "Yesterday at the seventh hour the fever left him." If John here uses the Jewish notation, there would have been ample time for the father to return home the same day, but if he uses the Roman system, then it was in the evening when the healing words were spoken, and the father could not return home until the day following. The recovery seems to have been practically instantaneous, as the expression used by the servants indicates.

V. 53.—"So the father knew that it was at the same hour, in the which Jesus said unto him, Thy son liveth." That which he had strongly suspected, he now knows; what he had believed has become a proven fact. "Himself believed, and his whole house." His faith which he already possessed, confirmed, while the entire household, convinced by the occurrence that had taken place in the family circle, also accepted Jesus as Divine.

V. 54.—"This is again the second miracle that Jesus did, when he was come out of Judea into Galilee." From the accounts in the other Gospels we learn nothing of two distinct returns from Judea to Galilee, yet their silence does not contradict the assertions of our author. Each of these returns was signalized by a miracle, calculated to impress His disciples with His true dignity and authority.

LESSONS FOR TO-DAY.

1. Opportunities pass quickly. Ours may be few.
2. God's business demands haste.
3. There is danger lest familiarity with the Gospel should harden the heart.
4. Each sinner is sick, nigh unto death.
5. Jesus is near to call to life.
6. "Seek ye the Lord while he may be found."
7. "Hear and your souls shall live."
8. God's Word is yea and amen forever.

The Lord's Money.

"BERTIE, Bertie, isn't this a shame?" cried little Casper Hall, as he held up a silver quarter for his elder brother to look at.

It was a bright quarter, and at first sight there was nothing the matter with it, but closer inspection showed that it had been bored, and the hole afterward been carefully filled up.

"They wouldn't take it where I bought my slate," said Casper ruefully, "and then I tried to pass it at the candy-shop, and the lady shook her head, and when I offered it to the conductor of the car, he was quite cross, and asked me if I didn't know how to read. When I said 'Yes, of course I do,' he pointed to a notice in big letters, 'No mutilated coin received here.' What shall I do with it?" finished the little fellow with a sigh.

"You have no idea who gave it to you, have you, Casper?" said Bertie.

"Not the least. It is part of the change I had from Uncle John's Christmas gift to me."

"Well, you must be sharper next time. Now, if I were you, I would put it into the missionary box. The society will work it off somehow."

"But I don't want to put a whole quarter in the box."

"It is not a whole quarter, Casp; it's a quarter that's had a hole in it. Nobody'll take it from you. You may just as well get rid of it in that way as any other."

Bertie and Casper Hall were in their father's library when this conversation took place. They thought themselves alone. But just on the other side of a curtain, which divided the room from the parlor, their Cousin Ethel was sitting. As Casper moved toward the mantle, where the family missionary box stood in plain sight, Ethel drew the curtain aside and spoke to him.

"Boys," she said, "I did not mean to listen, but I could not help overhearing you, and, Casper, dear, don't drop that quarter into the box, please."

"Why not, Ethel?"

"The Lord's money goes into that box."

Bertie looked up from his Latin grammar to meet the glowing face of the little girl. Her eyes were shining and her lip quivered a little, but she spoke gravely: "It was the lamb without blemish, don't you know, that the Hebrews were to offer to the Lord? If you saw Jesus here in this room, you would not like to say, 'I give this to Thee, because nobody else will have it.' It was gold, frankincense and myrrh the wise men offered the infant Jesus."

The boys drew nearer Ethel. She went on: "It isn't much we can give to Him who gave Himself to us, but I believe we ought to give Him our best, and what costs us something. Excuse me, but it seems you mean to drop a battered coin into God's treasury, just to get it out of sight."

Casper and Bertie agreed with Ethel. They were about to do wrong for want of thought. Are there no older people who should remember that the Lord's money ought to be perfect, and of our best?—Christian Giver.

SMOOTH THE ROAD.—When the Italians paved some of those paths by which we climb to their villages, they must have carefully turned each stone with its most awkward side uppermost, for they have the roughest of rough roads. One is apt to think that we might have done better; certainly we could not have done worse. In every-day life we meet with individuals who appear to turn the worst side uppermost in reference to everything; they magnify difficulties, they discover imperfections, they create irritations, and in general they make the worst of everything. If an ill word can be said, they say it; if a fault can be found, they spy it out. Good souls, what are you at? Is there not enough of care and sorrow in the world already? Better far would it be if half your ingenuity were expended in smoothing the road, instead of wasting it all in making the way of life more stony than it need be.—Sword and Trowel.

Lotta—Philadelphia's Favorite.

IT was always a marvel to the amusement loving public how Lotta could be so sick that the Chestnut St. Opera House, Philadelphia, was compelled to be closed for one week, about two years ago, and that at the end of that time she was well enough to resume her play of "Nitouche." More than this it was noticed that her voice had acquired fresh volume, and in "Nitouche," which is a singing play, she could be heard in ensemble as well as in solo. Among all the gifted ladies who adorn the stage Lotta is decidedly the pet and favorite. Her intense vitality, her beauty and the versatility of her talents draw all classes to see her. She has been on the stage since her eighth year, and in all that time the breath of scandal has never once assailed her. She is a phenominally devoted child to her mother, in whose society she is found at all times. Can it be wondered at that this little lady returned so soon to her labor at the Opera House, when we remember that this speedy restoration was due to the inhalation of Compound Oxygen? A press correspondent writes: "It was at the residence of Mrs. James H. Heverin, of Delancy Place, (wife of the eminent counsellor) that I obtained a brief interview with Lotta in reference to the treatment of Drs. Starkey & Palen, which prevented her a great pecuniary loss. The little comedienne was spending the day there and as she answered my card she came bounding into the parlor, throwing herself into a luxurious armchair, and as soon as the formalities of a visit were complied with, I at once broached my subject.

"I hear you have tried Compound Oxygen treatment, Lotta?'

"Oh, yes! You remember the terrible sore throat I had two years ago—that it baffled the skill of my New York physicians? After burning my throat and positively prohibiting my appearance before an audience for an unlimited time, I was promised great things if I would try the 'Oxygen,' so I immediately came to Philadelphia and put myself under the care of Drs. Starkey & Palen."

"Did you experience relief immediately?"

"It was evident from the first inhalation that I had done the right thing, for it seemed to bring the whole trouble under immediate control."

"Then you do not favor burning the throat or any of the methods usually resorted to?"

"No. I think it a harsh and cruel treatment and it cannot be long before Compound Oxygen will come to the rescue of all the profession."

"Drs. Starkey & Palen claim that the health obtained by the Compound Oxygen treatment is as genuine and permanent as one's original health. Does your experience confirm that opinion?"

"Yes, it most certainly does. I have not been sick an hour since I used the Oxygen. My mother has also been greatly benefited by the use of the Oxygen and is as great an enthusiast as I. It seems to invigorate the whole constitution and imparts fresh life to every part of the body. In my profession I am always studying from nature. I observe the expressions, gestures and ways of the various people with whom I meet, and find that my power of observation has grown more acute and discriminating since my treatment with the Oxygen. In the voice alone there is a most perceptible gain. Long and sustained notes have become easy and whether talking or singing I find it now no labor. Persons who sing or talk much on stage or platform feel a certain amount of exhaustion at the end of the season and to them the use of the Compound Oxygen would be of great value. I wonder these gentlemen have not brought it to the notice of the acting profession before. It is just what we all need."

"Do you think it would have the same effect on the system as change of climate?"

"Yes, and without the disadvantages of long journeys in pursuit of health, such as the loss of home comforts and the interference with regular business pursuits."

"Did you have any unpleasant sensations while taking the Oxygen?'

"No, on the contrary, the sensations were pleasant."

"Do you give your full consent to make this interview public?'

"I certainly do. You are at liberty to say I said so."

Miss Lotta is one of the busiest little ladies in the world. Her engagements are continuously requiring her presence in the cities each season. She owns theatres and real estate in America and Europe, and large tracts of wooded land in the Northwest, indeed she is one of the wealthiest ladies of the stage. Lotta is modest about her own merits. She believes the test of talent is public appreciation. Surely no one has passed this test with greater eclat than this gifted lady, who is still young and fresh. Now if the Compound Oxygen can bring back to the stage each year this favorite and pet, in prime health, the public can but thank Drs. Starkey & Palen. Any who may desire to know more of the treatment of which so kindly words are spoken, should write to the office of the physicians, 1529 Arch St, for the literature on the subject, which is mailed free to all applicants.

That Tired Feeling

The warm weather has a debilitating effect, especially upon those who are within doors most of the time. The peculiar, yet common, complaint known as "that tired feeling," is the result. This feeling can be entirely overcome by taking Hood's Sarsaparilla, which gives new life and strength to all the functions of the body.

"I could not sleep; had no appetite. I took Hood's Sarsaparilla and soon began to sleep soundly; could get up without that tired and languid feeling; and my appetite improved." R. A. SANFORD, Kent, Ohio.

Strengthen the System

Hood's Sarsaparilla is characterized by three peculiarities: 1st, the combination of remedial agents; 2d, the proportion; 3d, the process of securing the active medicinal qualities. The result is a medicine of unusual strength, effecting cures hitherto unknown. Send for book containing additional evidence.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla tones up my system, purifies my blood, sharpens my appetite, and seems to make me over." J. P. THOMPSON, Register of Deeds, Lowell, Mass.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla beats all others, and is worth its weight in gold." I. BARRINGTON, 130 Bank Street, New York City.

To preserve the richness of color or delicacy of tint of your summer dresses, make suds of hot water and Ivory Soap, allow to cool until lukewarm, then wash your dresses in the solution. Ordinary soaps contain too much alkali, which in a short time bleaches the color and destroys its beauty. Prof. Silliman, of Yale College, says, "The Ivory Soap "can not injure the "most delicate fabric."

Free of charge. A full size cake of Ivory Soap will be sent to any one who can not get it of their grocer, if six two-cent stamps, to pay postage, are sent to Procter & Gamble, Cincinnati. Please mention this paper.

VOL. LVII.—No. 19. WHOLE No. 2911. | NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 12, 1886. | $2.65 A YEAR IN ADVANCE. No. 48 CHURCH STREET.

EDITORS: Rev. JOHN M. FERRIS, D.D. Rev. N. H. VAN ARSDALE.
ASSOCIATE EDITOR: MRS. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

THE ANNUAL MEETINGS yesterday of the ladies' missionary societies filled the ground floor of the large church on 5th avenue and 48th street with ladies, and the new year began under highly favorable auspices.

WE learn that there was a very interesting discussion at the meeting of the Pastors' Association on Monday last. Dr. Clark and Dr. Van Horn were present as a committee from the Ministerial Union at Philadelphia to confer with brethren here in reference to a union of the Reformed Church in America (Dutch) with the Reformed Church in the United States (German). After a free expression of opinion, a committee was appointed to make arrangements for holding a convention of ministers belonging to both bodies at some period in the autumn in Philadelphia, with a view to a full exchange of views and a fraternal consideration of all the aspects of the matter. Drs. A. G. Vermilye, Chambers, Taylor, and Oerter, and the Rev. Mr. Brett were made this committee. It is hard to see how any harm can come from such a conference, and it may be a means of great blessing to both bodies.

THE SABBATH SCHOOL UNION of the Classis of New York, before adjourning for the summer, has arranged for one more meeting, to be held, as stated on the fourth page, on May 18th. It is not necessary to tell those who have attended these conferences how agreeable in the best sense and how profitable they have been, and how they have promoted kindly feeling and sympathy among the teachers and officers of the Sunday-schools of our Church in this city and vicinity. The representatives of the schools have become acquainted with each other by these meetings, and friendship has followed naturally. The weather has moderated. The severe cold of last winter is over and a mild atmosphere may be expected for May 18th, besides the light of the almost full moon will be enjoyed, and if the sky should be clear, the circumstances will all favor a large attendance.

THE RED FLAG of the communist or anarchist is not the flag of this or of any other country. The men who unfurl it are as much worse than a wild beast as mind is superior to instinct in its power to work ruin. The workingmen and their Unions are not responsible for the anarchists, who have abandoned Europe to escape the surveillance of the law, and transferred their villainy to this country. The great body of workingmen have no sympathy with them or their methods. The anarchist is the foe of all law, all order, all morality and all religion. His law of life is the indulgence of his personal brutality. He acknowledges no right save his own to do as he pleases. He is a man, with a soul, the most desperately wicked of all wicked men, but still a man, to be instructed if possible and convinced of his depravity and led to repentance; but when he attempts to put his creed into practice is to be dealt with promptly, energetically, and with the utmost severity.

We have said that these men have emigrated to this country because they were constantly liable to arrest in Europe; but it is also true that they have been brought here. The lowest class of laborers, such a class as to ignorance, brutality and general degradation as our institutions do not produce, have been imported by contractors. They imbibed communistic opinions in Europe and here are the willing tools of anarchical demagogues. Contractors, especially railroad contractors, for the sake of having cheap labor have paid the fare of these most degraded of laborers across the Atlantic, and when through with them have turned them loose on the community. This policy has not only depressed the value of labor, but has also introduced a body of citizens which in almost every way threatens our institutions.

We have more to say on the labor question, but only desire to add to-day that the methods adopted in too many instances, in dealing with the workingmen, is really settling nothing. There are two opinions in conflict, and the fact should not be overlooked. The one is, "a man is worth what his place can be filled for." This is vehemently asserted, but not qualified by the fact that in the great majority of cases the place is only filled after a fashion, it being necessary almost invariably for the new man to pass through a period of pupilage. The other opinion is, "A man is worth what his work is worth." And this opinion is destined to triumph under the power of Christian civilization. The number of employers acknowledging its justice and adopting it as their rule is steadily increasing.

THE REVISION.—Last year there appeared in the Quarterly Review a severe diatribe against the Revised Version of the Old Testament, which was generally, and we believe justly, attributed to Dean Burgon. In the April number of the Contemporary Review there is an answer by Dr. J. J. Perowne, Dean of Peterboro, which is marvellous for its good temper and its keenness. It convicts Dean Burgon of very gross misrepresentations, which of course were not intentional, but the result of his violent prejudices. The grossest of these is his attributing to the revisers a determination "to throw doubt either in text or margin upon passages which have always been regarded by Christians as messianic." With this mere midsummer madness Dean Perowne deals as a man of sense should, simply denying all such miserable appeals to religious prejudice, as "untrue."

IS IT WISE?—The churches have paid into the treasury which maintains our Foreign Missions $81,386.55 during the fiscal year just concluded. Of this sum $13,931.19 were remitted in March and $25,063.48 in April, making together $38,994 67, or about six dollars short of $39,000. That is, nearly one-half of the income of the twelve months was received during the last two months. Now the treasury must pay each month one-twelfth of the appropriations for the year. If so large a part of the income is received in March and April, and February supplies just enough to pay its quota, the treasury must borrow the deficit of the previous nine months and pay about $1,200 in interest. The Church is to be commended for giving over eighty thousand dollars, even though it is rather tardy in doing it, but would it not be wise to give a larger portion of it earlier in the year? Is it not worth while to save $1,200 of interest, if it can be done? The apportionment of the year just at an end is good for that just begun. It is not an assessment, is only an indication of what each Classis should obtain in order to meet the need of the year. It has certainly been made without a trace of partiality, but probably partakes, in common with every work of man, in human fallibility, and may be open to correction. But it is a good guide. Would it not be wise for the pastor and his elders and deacons to take up that apportionment at their next meeting, consider it as seriously as it deserves, and decide whether an endeavor shall be made to obtain a part of it before September? When a work is to be done, and especially when it is so important and has so much depending on it, is it not best to go at it promptly? Shall we not ask ourselves, what would our Lord have us do? That He is inviting us to care for these foreign fields is as plain as can be. Shall we follow with alacrity where He leads? This, indeed, is not all we have to do as the disciples of Christ, but it is an important part of our profession and duty.

A VIGOROUS essay is on the fourteenth page, by the Rev. W. R. Taylor, of Philadelphia, suggesting how a new enthusiasm can be aroused in the Church. He urges that a conviction of the fact that souls are under condemnation and lost is what is now necessary to produce enthusiasm in Christian work. He writes this sentence: "Let the astonishing agreement between Scripture and the latest generalizations of moral science, assisted by natural science, on this subject be noted, and the results given to the people." The position is wisely taken. One of the most impressive lessons of science is that in regard to obedience and disobedience. It has been already noticed in these columns that the conclusion of the philosophers of the science of the present day is that all things proceed from and are controlled by an Infinite and Eternal Energy which is working for righteousness. Mr. Spencer's scheme presents as the culmination of evolution, the evolution of conscience in man. Therefore, the energy is moral, is working out a moral end. When, then, science comes, as come it must and will, to accept the Holy Scriptures,—when, in other words, it comes into the Church of Christ—what will it bring with it? What does it, indeed, present now as its last conclusion? A system, presided over by an infinite and enduring energy, moving on with no more regard for a man's wishes than for those of any other created thing, and moving with tremendous, irresistible force, with a force that no created thing and no combination of created things can resist, and moving on to produce righteousness. Under that system, as declared by nature, obedience is life and disobedience is destruction. Resistance is vain. Opposition is crushed before the mighty energy, is as though it did not exist, is swept out of the way as by a whirlwind. The internal force working on to the end is incalculable. As one observes it in operation upon the earth, in regulating the mighty and innumerable orbs which fill the sky, and in the immense changes which occur upon those orbs, he is overwhelmed with a sense of its inconceivable power. Obey and live, disobey and suffer and perish, is the law which rules throughout this vast domain. There is no judicial trial, no delay to bring about a conviction. Disobedience is opposition, antagonism, and is destroyed at once. The process may continue for a time, but it begins at once and goes right on. Punishment is immediate and certain. Therefore, in simple words, when science attempts to define the mystery of life it says that it is the harmony of a thing with its surroundings, and declares that when it breaks that harmony it perishes. There is perfect propriety in Mr. Taylor's sentence. The number is large of those who suppose that the science of the day releases them from the consequences of transgression. They need to be told that their supposition is without foundation, that it is exactly contrary to the fact. Science presents a system punishing a disobedient organism with a fearful punishment, and the suffering of the organism is according to its capacity to suffer.

Rutgers College.

NO refutation of the anonymous and unjust attacks in certain newspapers upon President Gates, and through him against the College itself, could be more effective than the following editorial from the Targum of April 30th, and this because the Targum is a paper published by the students themselves. What some unknown scribbler may say is entitled to no weight whatever in comparison with what the students in their own college paper say. Here is the editorial:

"The friends of the college must have been somewhat surprised and grieved at the unwarranted reports that have been recently circulated in the daily papers concerning our 'Alma Mater.' That one particularly in the New York World was dictated in such a spirit of personal malice and exaggeration in regard to President Gates that it substantially defeated itself and is unworthy of serious consideration. Some of the young gentlemen who underwent examination by the President and are now suffering from the discipline of suspension inflicted by the faculty, have had the honor and magnanimity to be foremost in denouncing this infamous article as a misrepresentation and a slander. The pyrotechnic display and racket which the omniscient reporters make over a little disorder on 'All Fools' Day,' would be quite amusing if it were not for the wrong and injurious impressions which are thus conveyed to the public. Outsiders might naturally infer from all this newspaper talk that Rutgers is the home not of gentlemen and scholars, but of idlers and rowdies. Nothing could be further from the truth. We doubt if there is an institution between the two oceans where, as a general thing, the students are more orderly, studious and successful in the pursuit of legitimate work than ours have been during Dr. Gates' administration, and now are. The standard of scholarship is, as many of our over-worked fellows are not slow to admit, high; the deportment of the classes and individuals excellent, and the moral and religious atmosphere is a daily inspiration to many, while it certainly must be very gratifying to parents and guardians who take long and earnest views of the life before young men. To be sure, this little reactionary outbreak occurred as an 'April Fool' joke, but it is after all only a ripple on the usually calm and placid surface under which have flowed the deep and strong currents of the best kind of training in study and character during the entire year. Again, every manly fellow among us feels like protesting against the mean and malicious attempt recently made to defame the reputation of our honored president, and in this way to drag the good name of our 'Alma Mater' in the mire. Dr. Gates needs no defence at our hands. The wise and efficient work which he has done here speaks for itself to every person who has interest enough in education in general, or in this institution in particular, to find out what has actually been going on at Rutgers and how bright its present prospects are. And as for others—well, they will be set right in due time, provided they are of enough consequence to make it worth the while."

SWEETNESS AND LUCIDITY.—For an example of how not to practice Mr. Arnold's dictum as to how men ought to write, commend us to a sceptical German. Edward Von Hartmann has published a book on The Religion of the Future, which has been translated into English. It is a curiosity. It is foolish, he thinks, to expect that the coming religion is to be a development of Christianity, for Jesus Christ taught nothing new, nothing to entitle Him to influence modern thought. The success of Christianity has been due to the teachings of St. John and St. Paul, and the world has outlived them. He bestows his blows in equitable allotment all around, for he asserts that liberal Christianity is essentially irreligious. Therefore Von Hartmann will not be in favor with the advocates of Progressive Orthodoxy. But when he is through with demolition and becomes constructive, then the fog thickens and every trace of sweetness has vanished. Here is a specimen:

Without eudaemonological pessimism must evolutionistic optimism lead to irreligious secularism; without evolutionistic optimism must eudaemonological pessimism become an indolent despondency, or degenerate into religious asceticism.

We don't care which wins. We are willing that this optimism and pessimism shall fight it out without gloves. Meanwhile we prefer the clearness and grace of the Scriptures to the profound darkness in which Von Hartmann gropes. It cannot be long before all such ridiculous speculation as this would-be philosopher laboriously works out will receive the contempt of the German people, and the more of such stuff sceptics publish the sooner men everywhere will despise and reject modern unbelief.

"Old Colony" Papers.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE LABOR MOVEMENT.

I HEARTILY agree with the INTELLIGENCER'S manly and Christian expressions of sympathy with the cause of the workingmen. We are in danger just now of losing sight of the stern necessities which have forced them to organization in self-defence, and the usual equity of their demands. And there is nothing to be more regretted in the recent history of the labor movement than the loss of public sympathy, which has resulted from precipitate action, unjustifiable claims, foolish counsels, and departure by the Knights of Labor from the fundamental principles of their own order and the counsels of their wisest and highest leaders. The result of inevitable failure and of the alienation of public sentiment will in the end prove a blessing to the cause of labor and labor organization. It will open the eyes of King Labor to his weakness and his peril, making His Majesty more careful to count the cost before going to war at his own charges against King Capital, more willing to confer and arbitrate before resorting to extreme measures, and more ready to accept the counsel of men like Chief Engineer Arthur and Master-workman Powderly against boycotting and violence and other concomitants of the strike. And a wholesome lesson has been learned by the organizations themselves, as well as by politicians and the nation generally, that the American people have no idea of surrendering their liberties to any tyranny, even though it call itself "the people," and that we have no conception of liberty which is not controlled by law.

Nevertheless, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that we have suddenly been brought face to face with the supreme peril of our institutions, and their ultimate crucial test. This consists of the tendency of the most radical element in any cause to gain control, and the impossibility of estimating the trend and outcome of any popular movement from its principles or its beginnings.

The rapid evolution of this labor movement is a curious study. Organizations for mutual support and defence are of quite recent growth in our country, though we find such societies of artizans as far back as the Roman Republic. Under the name of "guilds," especially in Holland and Belgium, they antedate the historic period. In the Middle Ages they were a power not only for the purposes of trade, but as a bulwark against political oppression. In England the whole laboring population was virtually enrolled in guilds, and the commercial supremacy of that country is largely due to them. When restricted to their proper sphere, such leagues are laudable and beneficent, and will have the sympathy of all but the most selfish and narrow-minded. These objects are, on the one hand, the care of disabled members and the relief of their families, and on the other hand, coöperative action in resisting the oppression of organized capital and in obtaining better terms for the labor which they have to sell.

It soon became evident, however, that certain things would be requisite in order to give the utmost efficiency to this new force. Within its own ranks the "union" must be absolute master of the wills and action of its members, and hence there must be the secret and oath-bound association, wherein every man must render instantaneous and unquestioning obedience to the central power. It was also thought to be necessary to confine employment to "union" labor, by coercing employers into dismissing non-union workmen, and at the same time to restrict admission to the ranks of skilled labor by limiting the number of apprentices. For example, a plumber can only be allowed to have one apprentice to twelve journeymen, and a father whose two sons were learning their trade with him was recently deserted of his thirteen workmen because he would not dismiss one of them.

The next step was to federate these separate "unions" into one general organization, whereby common action could be taken throughout the entire country, and "Labor" itself be arrayed against Capital as such, and prepared to concentrate its whole strength and resources at any point of conflict. Hence the central national executive would become vested with powers, which can be compared with nothing less than the famous Council of Ten at Venice in the fourth century. The most successful attempt at this general association has been "The Knights of Labor." It is impossible to know precisely the extent of this organization,—its own members claiming for it a membership of from half a million to a million. It is thought, however, that its actual strength is not over two hundred and fifty thousand, though doubtless the increase will be very rapid in case of success.

The demands and resistance of the labor unions have naturally led to the withdrawal of their members from time to time from the service of their employers, in the hope of obtaining concessions by the stoppage of business and the loss of profits. These "strikes," when managed wisely, have often accomplished their object in whole or in part. But quite as often they have been precipitate and ill-considered, and without a preliminary exhaustion of every means of negotiation and arbitration. This frequent failure has resulted chiefly from the fact that employers in most kinds of occupation have been able to replace their "strikers" by new hands, already acquainted with the work or soon drilled to it. In spite of the proportions of the organization, it was found that the laborers outside far outnumbered it. The logical conclusion to which, therefore, the movement had to come was to bring the power of intimidation to bear against such recruits—by contemptuous epithets, such as "scabs" and "rats," by offering support for remaining in idleness, and by threats and violence. Even then it was found that the weapons of war were defective. It was not enough to prevent the reënforcement of men; there must be a cutting off of the supplies, and a common movement against all the allies of the enemy.

And here the fertile genius of the Irish peasant came to the rescue by inventing the "boycott," which derives its name from the landlord against whom the measure was first conspicuously directed. The business itself of the employer must be struck at, and his employing power be palsied. The process of intimidation,—by withdrawal of patronage or, if need be, by personal violence—must be brought to bear upon all who have dealings with him. The small retailer must thus be stript of his customers. The manufacturer must be deprived of not only his trade, but his supply of material. The railroad must be cut off from all connecting or coöperating roads, at the cost of stopping the entire traffic and travel of the country. It becomes a commercial siege, with its blockade in order to starve the besieged into surrender. Hence a genuine state of war cannot fail to arise, with an adoption of the principal that "all is fair in war,"—war, too, which cannot stop with "capital," but of necessity finds itself arrayed against all labor which is not enrolled in its own ranks, war upon all business, and upon the entire public interests. Then when the police and the military are brought in to maintain order and clear the channels of intercourse and traffic, the contest becomes one against law and government.

Is it wonderful that these movements are hot-beds for the growth of Socialism, and that our laboring population is becoming more and more tinctured with prejudices against all private property, and more intent upon getting possession of the government in order to make the State the sole capitalist and employer? Nor can we shut our eyes to the fact that these organizations have become leavened with the impression that the Church is a chief obstacle in their way, and have learned to hear without protest a doctrine of human rights which is not compatible with the divine government and is often an attack upon all things sacred. And every outbreak like those which have characterized this season greatly accelerates the insidious spread of these principles. What a school for demagogue and infidel teaching is afforded by these multitudes of unoccupied, excited, and mostly ignorant men spending their time in saloons and public meetings, and perhaps bitterly watching a slowly waning cause and their wasting means of livelihood. My heart, too, is deeply pained as I realize that so many thousands are learning habits of idleness and dissipation and, if displaced as most of them will be, will drift into the life of tramps and outlaws, and their families into vice and beggary.

We shall not witness the supreme crisis of this evolutionary movement in our day,—perhaps none of those old enough now to read the INTELLIGENCER. There is too much land yet to be occupied on this continent, and the wages of the laboring man are not yet so depressed by competition as to occasion more than temporary discontent. But the time is coming when the issue will be tried on such a scale as the world has never seen,—whether a government by the people can save itself from the licentious, leveling, and short-sighted instincts of its lower elements, who have learned their power by their very political freedom, and have received just such and so much education as to read godless and demagogue books and papers.

Punch's Welcome to Dr. Holmes.

O THOU, whose wisdom and whose wit,
Whose fancy and whose fable,
Have won two hemispheres to sit
Around thy breakfast table.
Our old-world notions never find
A more indulgent critic,
Though your sharp scalpel lurks behind
Your verdicts analytic.

In Elia's hand the essay writ
With admirable fancy,
A thousand prosy subjects lit
With potent necromancy.
So now across the western seas,
Atlantic billows tost on,
There comes, in precious books like these,
A Lamb—"designed of Boston."

I never crossed from this old shore
Atlantic ocean ridges,
I never heard the Charles downpour
Through all the Boston bridges;
And yet I seem to know your home,
The "Hub," the Boston people;
To see the State House with its dome,
Hear chimes from Christ Church steeple.

For I have pondered o'er each page,
Till half by heart I know it,
Of keen "Professor," kind and sage,
Of tender-hearted "Poet."
Before the "Autocrat" I see
In vain his foemen flounder,
Like Don Diego Perez, he
A veritable "pounder."

So trust me, Doctor, writing here,
Afar 'mid English daisies,
Howe'er unkempt my rhymes appear,
That honest are my praises.
I cry "Peccavi!" if you care
With my poor verse to quarrel.
Yet Punch may ask you'll deign to wear
This leaf of English laurel. —London Punch.

Some Recollections

OF THE BATTLE OF PLATTSBURGH, AND OF THE FIGHT BETWEEN THE FLEETS OF THE AMERICAN AND BRITISH ON LAKE CHAMPLAIN, ON SEPTEMBER 11, 1814.

BY CAPTAIN WALTER BICKER.

Part I.

IN order to a more comprehensive view of this affair, some preliminary statements will be necessary. As I was a participant in the battle it will be necessary for me to speak of myself somewhat.

I was appointed and commissioned as Ensign in the Sixth Regiment, U. S. Infantry, on the 29th July, 1813. Col. Jonas Simonds, of the same regiment, was Superintendent of the Recruiting District in the city of New York. He assigned me to duty in that city on that service, and directed me to open a recruiting rendezvous in a not very reputable location —East George street, now Market street. This was a sad beginning of army life for a boy seventeen and a half years of age! But here "the good hand of my God was upon me" to keep me from harm from the evils I was daily called upon to witness. Providentially this did not last long, for in the month of January succeeding I was assigned to duty in a new company that was organized from the recruits at the general depot at Fort Gansevort, by Captain Humphries of our regiment, with First Lieutenant James Baily (son of the New York Postmaster) and myself as subalterns, and quartered on Ellis' Island, New York harbor. Lieut. Baily, not yet having joined the company, and Capt. Humphries having obtained leave of absence for a fortnight, left me in command of the post, a fort of sixteen 32 pounder cannon and 110 men.

In the following month of March the company was removed to Governor's Island, and in June following was ordered to proceed to Plattsburgh, via Greenbush, (opposite Albany). By sloop the company went to Greenbush, where it was furnished for campaign duty, with tents and camp equipages, axes, sheet iron kettles and pans, etc., and in a few days was on its line of march for headquarters.

From Greenbush to Whitehall, (head of Lake Champlain,) we marched afoot, accomplishing the usual military distance each day, of twenty miles,—a little trying to the feet of young men and boys, as the exhibition of the lower extremities showed at night by the blisters they revealed. But no matter, the march was completed without any serious consequences. From Whitehall the residue of the route was easier. A steamboat was chartered and the company embarked on board. Passing Ticonderoga and Crown Point, of Revolutionary memory, on the West, and touching at a small village on the Vermont shore, (the name I do not recollect,) and at Burlington, we were about twenty-four hours in getting to Plattsburgh from Whitehall. Here military duty and regular camp service began, and the novice put upon the high road to fame, but he left the army without reaching it!

At this time Gen. Izard, with about eight thousand men, lay encamped north of Plattsburgh, nearer the village of Champlain, upon the borders of the line between New York and Canada. Early in August, with all the troops under his command, he was ordered to march to the Niagara frontier, leaving Brigadier-General Alexander McComb (the senior Brig.-Gen.) with fifteen hundred regulars at Plattsburgh. It was not long before stirring times began in our camp. Working parties were called for by the Chief Engineer, Capt. DeRussey, who, with his detail of assistants, was seen drawing mysterious lines over certain portions of the ground around and about us. The result terminated in the completion of three redoubts of fair dimensions but of frail character, being constructed of frames of small timber and siding about three inches thick, filled in between the outer and inner linings with sand, making a wall of some six feet thick. These redoubts were of irregular form, and might have covered a half an acre each, and were placed at intervals of some two or three hundred yards apart. They were built upon a space of ground between the Saranac river and the lake, some one thousand feet south of the confluence of the river with the lake, leaving ample room for the operations of large bodies of troops in our front. The rear was an extensive open plain, formerly an encamping ground for a brigade.

During this month of August large bodies of British troops, from the field of Waterloo in Europe, had been concentrating in the vicinity of Montreal, in Canada, and it was evident that something was in the wind, which our ears might get the sound of by-and-by. There was no doubt that Gen. McComb was kept well advised upon matters and things in general, and of some things in particular, as the activity about our camp would seem to indicate.

The month of August passed away and the eventful month of September began. Commodore McDonough's fleet lay tranquilly moored in Cumberland Bay, a beautiful expanse of the water of Lake Champlain, land locked on three sides,—the mainland on the west; the bay running down northward some two miles, the shore at the bottom, or northernmost extremity, curving around toward the east and extending to the terminus, about two miles south of the land at that point, called Cumberland Head. Everything seemed to fit in very nicely. All was quiet, and as a rumpus was expected all appeared ready for the fray.

On the night of the 5th of September, about twelve o'clock, an orderly appeared at my tent and called me up, saying Major Wool, the commandant of our regiment, wished to see me at his tent without delay. It was not many minutes before I was there. His address to me was, "Lieut. Bicker, I have directions from Gen. McComb to send to him immediately an active and intelligent officer to go on special service for him. Get yourself ready with the least possible delay and report yourself to him at his headquarters." In a short time I was in the presence of the general and reported myself accordingly, as having been sent by Major Wool in obedience to his directions. "Well, sir," said the general, "here (showing me a sealed package) is a communication to Governor Chittenden of Vermont, which you will take charge of and proceed to Burlington, (where the Governor is supposed to be,) and deliver it to him. Await his orders and return with his reply to me as expeditiously as possible. You will take my barge at the dock, which has instructions to take you to Commodore McDonough's ship, and here is a note to him to furnish you with a conveyance to South Hero Island, whence you will make the best of your way to Burlington by such means as you can command."

At the dock I found the general's barge ready, and by it proceeded to the ship "Saratoga," and, being admitted on board by the officer of the deck, stated I had a note from Gen. McComb for the commodore. Begging me to wait a minute, he went to the commodore's cabin, and directly returned and showed me the way into the cabin. The commodore was lying down in his berth. I handed him the note. After reading it he said, "I am surprised that Gen. McComb would call upon me at this time when I want every man of my ship's company present, as I know not at what moment I may be attacked by the British fleet. My guard boats are now out beyond Cumberland Head watching the movements of the British fleet, and at any moment the signal may be given of its approach." Thinking for a moment, he said, "You shall have the conveyance." Sending for the officer on duty on deck, he directed him to furnish me with a suitable escort. Soon I had placed at my disposal a well-manned barge with a midshipman in command and with ample instructions to be expeditious both in going to and returning from the Island.

It was now about three o'clock in the morning. The night was bright starlight, I recollect, and quite balmy for a September morning, and the water of the lake quite calm. We made rapid progress with some sixteen sturdy men at the oars, but the day began to dawn before we reached the Island, and we could see the guard boats of our fleet coming in from their night watch, but no signs of the British fleet making any movement. Lake Champlain, at the place where my route lay, may be some five miles or more wide from our shore to South Hero Island.

We soon found a good landing place near a farm house. A male inmate of the house was already outdoors, busy in his line of occupancy. I thanked the polite midshipman, whom I found very companionable in the short journey of the early morning, for his kindness, and bidding him and his noble crew bon voyage back to their ship, made myself known to the farmer and asked if he could furnish me with a horse and a guide to Burlington, as I had despatches from Gen. McComb to the Governor, which I was instructed to deliver to him personally. He said he could, and he would be my guide.

South Hero Island is, (as my recollection serves me,) about three or four miles long, and a half to one mile wide. It lies about half a mile from the mainland on the Vermont side. The water between it and the opposite shore is shallow, and a bar, considerably of a serpentine form, runs across it. This is staked out by high stakes at intervals the whole length, as safety guides to the crossing of it. My horse and that of my guide were soon ready and, he leading the way, we were in single file making our way across this submerged pathway for the main shore. There were no difficulties encountered—the horses seeming to know the way, no doubt being accustomed to it. The only inconvenience was, that the roadway was not a perfectly even one, as sometimes I found it necessary to draw up my feet to save them from getting wet if I kept them in the stirrups. We were now upon the mainland and upon the main road to Burlington.

....."GERMAN PSYCHOLOGY OF TO-DAY," by Th. Ribot, has been admirably translated by Mr. James M. Baldwin, one of the most accomplished of the recent graduates of Princeton College, and is published with a preface by President McCosh. M. Ribot represents the empirical school, which seeks to ascertain the laws of mind by experiment and observation of the organs and action of the body. This is a departure in the direction of all modern science, and the results have been such that the author of this work claims it as a New Psychology, and confidently declares that "the old psychology" (derived from the examination of self-consciousness) "is doomed." This physiological psychology is entirely dissociated in this work from metaphysical theories and speculations, and is a record of the continuous work and multifarious experiments and discoveries of Müller, Weber, Volkmann, Dubois-Raymond, Fechner, Lotze, Wundt and others. It is a deeply interesting and suggestive work for all who desire to know the currents of contemporary thought, and there is no other single book which presents the entire subject. The author is himself no mere reporter, but an able and brilliant thinker and critic.

Dr. McCosh's preface is characterized by his usual lucidity and catholicity. (Charles Scribner's Sons.)

THE last meeting of this Union for the present season will be held on Tuesday, May 18th, at 8 P. M., in the lecture room of the 29th street and 5th avenue Church.

Mr. Ralph Wells is expected to speak upon "Jesus and His Little Ones."

Choice selection of music will be rendered by the choir of 48th street and 5th avenue Church. Election of officers, etc.

Pastors, consistories, teachers, officers and all who are interested in Sunday schools are cordially invited to attend. T. A. B.

A Successful Ladies' Meeting.

EDITOR INTELLIGENCER: Perhaps some of your readers will be interested to know how the Ladies' Missionary Society of one of our churches celebrated their anniversary. It was held on Easter Monday evening and was conducted entirely by the ladies themselves. Beautiful flowers banked about the pulpit formed the only fitting background to the figures and sentiments of the ladies, who represented in person and speech the refinement, intelligence, dignity, purity and power of the Gospel. It was the debut of the Society before a mixed audience of males and females. The pastor's wife presided, read the Scripture, announced the hymns, gave the Secretary's report, (who was absent on account of illness,) introduced the speakers and managed the whole service with excellent tact and fine taste.

A choir of young ladies furnished the music. Four other young ladies acted as ushers and assumed the responsibility of keeping the sexton quiet and of regulating the ventilation.

One of the older ladies offered prayer. The Treasurer read her report in a clear and distinct voice, showing a greater amount collected than during any previous year, for both home and foreign fields. Envelopes were used to gather the gifts of the people.

A paper, prepared by Mrs. P. D. Van Cleef, on the work the ladies of our Reformed Church are endeavoring to do in the West, was read by a member of the Society in a very praiseworthy manner, and the merit of the article itself called forth unstinted commendation.

Then Mrs. Margaret E Sangster followed with an address upon Woman's Work in China, full of information and inspiration. A tender, sympathetic spirit pervaded it. It awakened in every listener a keener consciousness of the power of the Gospel to lift woman out of her degradation in heathenism into the exalted place she holds in Christianity—the religion of the Son of the Virgin.

The service was characterized by simplicity, seriousness and elegance. There was a grace about it which would rebuke many a service conducted by men. The large congregation was pleased and profited. Indeed, the purpose of the meeting was not so much to celebrate what had been done during the past year as it was to incite greater activity for the coming year, and we feel it accomplished its aim, for when the "deaconesses" passed the plates they received a liberal collection. There are two things spoken of with regret—one seriously, viz.: the absence of Mrs. Van Cleef, occasioned by the sudden illness of her esteemed husband, and the other facetiously, viz.: that a male voice should have been heard in the service—the pastor pronounced the benediction.

It was a meeting long to be remembered by those present, and in every sense successful.

A MALE ATTENDANT.

GREENVILLE, JERSEY CITY, April 30th, 1886.

....ALBANY, N. Y.—The year which has just closed has been a fruitful and encouraging one to the First Church. The spiritual status of the church has been greatly advanced and its material condition improved under the pastorate of the Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman. His ministry has been signally successful, not only in promoting the spiritual interests of the church, but also in restoring, harmonizing and uniting its agencies to systematic, aggressive and cordial action in the service of the Lord. Every evidence of intestine disturbance, which invariably results from a prolonged season of spiritual dearth such as this church experienced, has been entirely obliterated, and its report for the past year discloses a thorough unification of all factors in the church, and gives promise of still more gratifying results in the year now beginning. Sixty-eight communicants have been received into fellowship, and thirty-six families added during the year. At the last communion alone twenty-three were added to the membership, showing that the seed abundantly sown is beginning already to be abundantly productive. The sum of $21,781 was raised during the year for congregational and benevolent purposes, and, with its membership constantly increasing, it may not be unsafe to anticipate even a stronger financial exhibit than this at the close of this fiscal year. H.

THE MADISON AVENUE CHURCH, Rev. Dr. Davis, pastor, has just closed a most prosperous year. In their report to the Classis of Albany up to April 1st, they show an increase of fifty-nine persons on their roll of membership, and a large number of families have been added to the pew list. They have raised for church and congregational needs during the year $23,751.82, and for religious and benevolent causes $9 070.63, making a total for all purposes of $32,-821 55.

The Sunday-school has largely advanced under the charge of Mr. George D. Fearey. The Rev. Dr. Davis is now delivering on Sabbath evenings a series of May Day Lectures to Young People.

....THE CLASSIS OF ILLINOIS wishes the words, "incapable of any saving good and prone to evil," to be substituted for "incapable of any good and prone to all evil," in the form for the Baptism of Adults. That is, it would have the word "saving" inserted before "good" and "all" stricken out before "evil." With this desire it requests the General Synod to comply.

....THE CLASSIS OF IOWA met in the First Church of Orange City, Iowa, April 13th and 14th. The members were entertained by the hospitable members of the American Reformed Church. Nearly every church in the Classis was represented. Some members came over one hundred and fifty miles to attend Classis. This is a heavy expense for the weak churches or pastors. Ours is a missionary Classis on the frontier.

According to the Rules of Order, Rev. A. Buursma took the chair, and Rev. James De Pree became clerk pro tem. The first half hour of each day was spent in devotional exercises. These exercises proved very interesting and profitable. The Rev. J. W. Warnshuis, the retiring president, preached a timely sermon on the evening of the first day from the text, "Feed My Lambs."

Communications to Classis were numerous. Among them were four requests for church organizations; one from Wabonda, Dak., one from Marion and Bon Homme, Dak., one from Ramsay, Iowa, and one from Chapin, Iowa. The Christian Reformed Church of Le Maas, Iowa, was unanimously received by this Classis and its name was placed upon the roll of churches. Classis looked upon this as a noteworthy and unusually remarkable event.

The third annual report from the Board of Trustees of the Northwestern Classical Academy was presented. The report showed progress and gave a very encouraging account of its increasing usefulness. It proved conclusively, as never before, to Classis the great need there is of this institution in the Northwest, and its helpfulness in the prosecution of our mission work. It ought not to live from hand to mouth, but should have an endowment of at least $50,000. The year closes without debt, but it has no present security of funds for the future. "As thy day so shall thy strength be" is our strength in carrying on this great and necessary work.

Classis organized a "Board of Benevolence in the Northwest." The object of this Board shall be to aid indigent young men in the prosecution of their studies in the Northwestern Classical Academy. At the fall session of Classis a committee was appointed to receive and disburse money for needy young men. This committee drew up a constitution for a "Board of Benevolence," which was accepted. Our work in this direction is also growing so fast that additional responsibilities are added to our already heavy burden.

Classis became a committee of the whole for securing the necessary funds for the purchase of the Town Hall for educational purposes. This committee is to secure funds within the bounds of Classis. An Executive Committee was duly elected. Each pastor shall act as chairman of a committee in his own church, and act in connection with the Executive Committee. The members of Classis subscribed over $250 toward the purchase of the Hall.

The Committee on Statistics and State of Religion presented a most encouraging report. It contained the following facts: The Lord is truly blessing our work for Him and His cause. This is shown: (1.) Our Classis, not yet two years old, is larger by one third more churches than it was one year ago. (2.) The number of our churches on the roll is larger than that reported last year by any Classis in the denomination. (3.) We have received this year 212 on confession of faith. (4.) The contributions for benevolent and congregational purposes are much larger than those of the preceding year, notwithstanding the shortage in crops and the low prices. (5.) The number of families under our ministrations is 1,479, last year it was 839. (6.) All the churches report unity, harmony and the blessing from on high in the conversion of sinners and renewed consecration of the people of God. It closes by saying: We thank God for His past mercies and take courage and rely on His strength as we begin our work for another year.

Classis expects to add the names of at least five new churches to its roll before the close of 1886. Committees were appointed to visit these fields and if the way be open to organize. From the reports from these places there is no doubt of the action of the committees.

Four calls were presented for approval. Recommendations to the Board of Domestic Missions and the Church Building Fund, to the amount of nearly $8,000 were made. Will the churches and people of God please note this fact? The recommendations were made conscientiously. The Classis are convinced that we cannot get along with less than that; we need more, but fear that the liberality of the Church will be severely taxed already.

Steps were taken by this Classis for the formation of a Classis of Dakota. We know and are convinced that measures in this direction are taken rather early, but our unprecedented growth and the immense distances many of our members are obliged to come, make this apparently hasty step a necessity.

The Rev. Wm. J. Skillman was received from the Presbytery of Southern Dakota. S. C.

....THE PARTICULAR SYNOD OF NEW YORK met in regular session in the Reformed Church of Newburgh, on Tuesday, May 4th, and continued its session until Wednesday afternoon. The Synod was opened promptly at 3 o'clock with prayer by the retiring President, Rev. Herman C. Berg, of College Point, L. I. The Synod was organized by electing the Rev. C. L. Wells, of Flatbush, L. I., as President, and the Rev. Charles W. Fritts, of Fishkill-on-Hudson, as Vice President. The Revs. John G. Gebhard and John H. Gillespie were elected Temporary Clerks. During the devotional exercises on Tuesday afternoon the Rev. Charles W. Fritts read his paper on the "Inspiration of the Scriptures." Immediately after devotional exercises on Wednesday morning Dr. Oerter read his paper on "The Relation of Miracles to the Laws of Nature," and Rev. Stephen D Noyes, of Kingston, followed with his paper on "Probation." An appreciative vote of thanks was tendered by Synod to the authors of these important and scholarly treatises.

On the evening of Tuesday the Synodical sermon was preached by the retiring President, the Rev. Herman C. Berg, from Galatians 6:14, "But God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me and I unto the world." It was a forcible presentation of the meaning of the Cross to the Christian, and prepared the hearers very properly for the communion of the Lord's Supper, which was celebrated after the sermon, the bread being administered by the Rev. Wm. J. Leggett and the wine by Rev. Wm. F. Anderson.

On Wednesday morning the Rev. Charles I. Shepard spoke in behalf of the Board of Domestic Missions, giving some practical hints in regard to that work for the several Classes to reflect upon. The Rev. A. V. V. Raymond was accredited to Synod as the representative of the Board of Foreign Missions. He filled his allotted time with remarks to the point and full of hopeful cheer in regard to the financial condition. Dr. Chamberlain, of India, being present as a member of Synod, was requested to speak on the same subject, and gave some interesting facts as to the benevolent spirit and its astonishing exhibitions among the converts and members of the churches in the Classis of Arcot.

The death of Gamaliel G. Smith, Esq., the Treasurer of the Foreign Board for many years, was mentioned with sorrow. The Rev. E. J. Runk offered the subjoined preamble and resolutions, which were seconded by Elder Theophilus A. Brouwer, and spoken to by him in a feeling manner as the personal friend of deceased for many years. The Synod unanimously adopted the following:

"Whereas, The Particular Synod has learned through its President of the death of the Elder, Mr. Gamaliel G. Smith, for many years the efficient and devoted Treasurer of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Reformed Church Therefore,

"Resolved, (1.) That the Particular Synod declares its sense of the loss which has, through this stroke of Divine Providence, befallen the Church.

"(2) That the Synod extend their prayerful sympathy to the widow and family of the deceased, wishing that the heavenly Father will console and support them in the hour of their sorrow.

"(3.) That the Synod would especially record its appreciation of the services of Mr Smith as Treasurer of the Board of Foreign Missions, in administering the funds of the Board, and supplementing the Security Fund of the Board at times of arrearage in the contributions for the work.

"(4.) That a copy of this preamble and resolutions be forwarded by the Stated Clerk to the family of the deceased, another to THE CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER for publication, and that they be spread upon the minutes of the Synod."

The Synod resolved to send up to General Synod two resolutions, one asking that Synod urge the proper measures be taken by Classes to bring together unemployed ministers and vacant fields; and one requesting that a new column be added to the Statistical Tables to record the number of "Absentee Members."

DANIEL VAN PELT, Stated Clerk.

....PASTORS' ASSOCIATION, N. Y., May 3d. The association discussed the exegesis of 1 Cor. 15: 29, and resolved to hear Dr. Chambers (who was absent) upon the subject at some subsequent meeting. May 10th Dr. A. G. Vermilye read on "Progressive Orthodoxy," and a committee of five was appointed by the chair to confer with Philadelphia ministers of the Reformed churches concerning an Interdenominational Convention in that city. The committee are the Rev. Drs. A. G. Vermilye, T. W. Chambers, W. J. R. Taylor, and J. H. Oerter, and the Rev. C. Brett.

....THE PROSPECT HILL MISSION BAND of the Reformed Church of Castleton, N. Y.—This is an organization of young people formed some two years since, and seems to be growing in strength and usefulness. They are devoted to Western missionary work. They have increased from $25 the first year to $38 for the year just closed, thus showing what could be accomplished for our shelterless people if all the Sabbath schools of our Church should take their places as helpers in the great work of saving this land for Christ. Shall not every Sabbath-school within our denomination have its mission band? COR. SEC.

....THE CLASSIS OF NEW YORK held an adjourned meeting on the afternoon of May 4th, and was devoted to the hearing of reports of various committees.

Among them was the report of the committee appointed to prepare a minute in reference to the late Stated Clerk of this Classis, which was as follows:

"The Classis of New York has accepted with deep regret the resignation of the Rev. Abraham Thompson as its Stated Clerk. For eight years he has faithfully, ably, and with admirable judgment served the Church in this capacity. We, his brethren, have also esteemed him very highly for his consecrated and helpful life as a minister of Christ. The Providence that has in the midst of his usefulness broken the strength our brother gave so freely to the service of Christ and His Church is altogether strange to us. We can only bow before the Divine will and commend him to the Almighty Father's care.

"To his wife and children we offer our loving sympathy in the trial they are now enduring."

The special committee appointed by Classis "to confer with the pastor and consistory of the Madison Av. Reformed Church, to consider whether the necessity for a dissolution of the relation now existing between them may not in some way be avoided," presented the following:

"The committee met at the house of Mr. W. H. Jackson, on Tuesday, April 27th, 1886, at 8 o'clock P M. All the members of the committee were present,—Dr. Ormiston, Chairman, Rev. Dr. Quackenbush, Judge Bookstaver and Mr. D. J. Steward. The members of the consistory were all present, [illegible] also the members of the great consistory, except two, who were unavoidably absent.

"The meeting was opened with prayer, the object of the meeting was stated by the Chairman, and then a long, earnest and friendly conference was held, in which several took part. All were of one mind in reference to the high esteem in which they held their pastor, and all expressed the strongest affection for him personally, nor did they fail to refer to his earnest, self-denying, self-sacrificing labors among them.

"They then gave a full account of the circumstances which in their judgment had led Dr. Reed to tender his resignation, and which had constrained them, however reluctantly, to concur with him in the propriety of the step he had taken.

"On Wednesday, at 4 30 o'clock P.M., at the house of the Chairman, the committee met with Dr. Reed, and held a full, frank and earnest conference with him. The entire interview only deepened the impressions which the committee had already received of the manliness of his character, the heartiness of his consecration and the unselfishness of his conduct, and made them feel more keenly the loss which the Classis will sustain should he remove beyond its bounds.

"In full view of all the circumstances, however, your committee unanimously resolved to recommend to Class's to grant the dissolution asked for in the terms of Dr. Reed's resignation."

In accordance with such recommendation, Classis, after a very cordial expression of regret at the imposed necessity, dissolved the relation, such dissolution to take effect on July 15th, 1886. S. C.

....At a meeting of the Consistory of the Madison Avenue Reformed Church, N. Y., held March 19th, 1886, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That we deeply regret that our beloved pastor, Rev. Edward A. Reed, D.D., has felt it wise to tender his resignation of the pastorate of this Church; and that this Consistory, while accepting it and uniting with him in the request to Classis for a dissolution of the pastoral relation, would place upon its records the following minute:

Resolved, 1. That this Church has had in the life and conversation of our beloved pastor a constant and beautiful example of a godly Christian minister.

2. That in the thoughtful and kindly ministrations at our houses, either in joy, or at the sick bed of our loved ones, or in the deeper and severer trials of the final partings with those sacredly cherished in our hearts, we have always found in our pastor the kind, tender, sympathetic and loving Christian friend, and the earnest, faithful servant of our glorious Redeemer.

3. That in view of the great work accomplished by him in behalf of the financial interests of this Church, we cannot fail to express our recognition of the obligations under which he has placed us.

4. That in his unswerving adherence to the standards of our Church, and the hopeful, confident assurances of the progress and triumph of the Church universal under the Great Captain of our Salvation, he has ever been to us a noble leader of the Lord's host.

5. That in the measure of success granted to the ministry of our beloved pastor, we recognize the manifest approval of our Lord, and the baptism of the Holy Ghost.

6. That we regret that circumstances beyond his and our control have made it manifest that the relation between us as pastor and people should be dissolved.

7. That we shall always follow him with our sympathy, our love and our prayers, that the Great Head of the Church will ever have him in His care and bountifully bless him in his ministry and in every relation of life.

8. That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Rev Dr. Reed, be read in the Church when the formal announcement shall be made of the resignation and its acceptance, and that a copy be sent to Classis with the request for the dissolution of the pastoral relation.

ABRAHAM QUACKENBUSH, Clerk.

....METUCHEN, N. J.—The church was gladdened Sunday, May 2d, in receiving into fellowship six new members—two by certificate and four by confession; of the latter three were young men from one class in the Sabbath school, thus cheering the heart of one of the most devoted teachers in the school. The pastor, Rev. James Cruickshanks, rejoices and gives thanks that his only son was among those who for the first time obeyed the injunction: "This do in remembrance of me." The young people's prayer-meeting, held before the evening service, increases the attendance at that service and promises great good. C.

....CENTREVILLE, MICH.—The last Sabbath in April was the fifth anniversary of Rev. A. Paige Peeke's entrance upon ministerial duties in this church. During the five years the membership of the church has been increased by eighty-nine additions, fifty four on confession and twenty five by certificate. Mr. Peeke preached on the Resurrection in the morning, administered the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and received ten members on confession. In the evening the Sabbath-school engaged in interesting Easter exercises. At both services the singing was particularly excellent. The offerings of the Sunday-school and congregation amounted to about $50, which will be devoted to purchasing new books for the library.

..THIRD CHURCH, ALBANY, N. Y.—This church has extended a call to the Rev. Joseph P. Davis, of the First Church of Bethlehem, N. Y. He has accepted it, and will begin his labors in Albany about the first of June.

....INSTALLATION.—The Rev. Thomas C. Easton, D.D, was installed Thursday evening, April 29th, pastor of the First Church, Newark, N. J. The audience was large. Dr. E. P. Terhune, of Brooklyn, preached the sermon. The charge to the pastor was given by Dr. W. J. R. Taylor; the charge to the people by Dr. David Waters. Revs. A. V. Raymond, J. N. Jansen, and Henry Vehslage assisted in the services. The music was of a superior character, and the floral decorations about the pulpit were beautiful. A cordial greeting of the new pastor followed the close of the interesting services.

....COHOES, N. Y.—The forty-sixth anniversary of the Sabbath-school of this church was held on Sunday evening, May 2d, in the presence of a large audience. The exercises, which opened by the singing of a processional hymn, the members of the school marching in the church in double ranks, were very interesting throughout and reflected great credit upon the school. The floral offerings were fine, and much appreciated. The report of the Secretary showed a membership of four hundred and thirty nine. Addresses were delivered by the pastor, Rev. J. Paschal Strong, D. J. Johnston and others.

....WESTERN THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—The first closing exercises of the Seminary since the re-opening, occurred in Hope Church, Holland, Mich., Thursday evening, April 29th. Mr. Dirk Scholten, of Alton, Iowa, the only graduating member, delivered an oration on "The Aim of the Christian Church." There were two other orations by Gerrit H. Hospers and Peter Wayenberg, and an address on "The Most Essential Qualifications for the Religious Teacher," by Rev. Peter Lepeltak, of Overisel, Mich. The programme was interspersed with several selections of enlivening music. The audience was large.

Gleanings from our Exchanges.

....The Rev. Wesley R. Davis, D D., of Albany, N. Y, has accepted the invitation extended by President Gates of Rutgers College, to preach the Baccalaureate sermon this year.

....During Easter exercises by the Sabbath-school of the Church of Amity, N. Y., Sunday evening, April 25th, the Bible class of the pastor, Rev. B. A. Bartholf, surprised him with the gift of a beautiful chair. The superintendent, A. Van Vranken, presenting it in behalf of the class, made a neat speech, which was feelingly responded to by the delighted pastor.

So Let It Be.

BY M. S. BECKER.

SMALLEST twigs across our pathway
Sometimes trip unwary feet;
While we would not think of stumbling
O'er the larger branch we meet.
Over daily, petty troubles,
There come many a sigh and groan,
While we lift the mountain hindrance
Oft in silence and alone.

Luscious berries are found hanging
Underneath their shading leaves;
Heaviest grain bends 'neath its burden,
Counting fullest headed sheaves.
Did we search as well for fruitage,
Hidden 'neath God's shading leaves,
Would we see the crown and honor
As our burden bends or grieves?

Days of cloud with naught of sunshine,
Make more eager for the light;
Wearied souls in deepest darkness
Seek God's hand to lead aright.
Disappointment and vexation
Teach there is a surer way:
E'en the night of sorrow bringeth
Lessons never learned by day.

Out of every dispensation
Earth may grandest problems prove;
And we've learned life's sweetest lesson,
When we've found that God is love.
By the forge the steel must harden,
Gold from refuse heat will free;
Tested faith may reach up higher,
Then, amen, so let it be!

A Modern Sir Galahad.

BY MARY R. BALDWIN.

CHAPTER VI.

"Oh, sweet pale Margaret,
Oh, rare pale Margaret."

OLD towns where the population and its character remain for the most part unchanged for years, present peculiar social phases, which seem to visitors from a constantly changing, growing city, quite ludicrous often. It happened when Tom Hyr ran down to spend a few days with his old college friend, Laurence Bowles, fresh as he was from the kaleidoscopic effects of the society in the metropolis, he found that his mental vision, or else his social habits required readjusting. But Anise was a surprise to him. She was the sweet maiden floweret of his dream—a dream which years of social experience had nearly dispelled; a dream which had first taken shape from the character of a dear sister. When Tom first looked upon the pale, lovely face he could have shouted for joy, simply that one of his youthful hopes seemed realized—that the poet's "rare pale Margaret" was not without foundation in fact.

Andrew Haynes had informed Tom of the adventure of Sir Galahad at the watering-place, and Tom had been quite anxious about the unworldly Laurence since. To tell the truth, nothing interested him more than the progress of a love affair, and he was impatient to judge for himself how far this watering-place experience had affected the knight of the dear old college days. But when he noticed the devotion with which the "sweet floweret" seemed to regard this knight, a sudden fear took possession of him. At first he would not have owned even to himself the cause of this fear, but down deep in his heart he was conscious of owning the right of a discoverer. To have been seeking all his life for something, and to find it at last only to see it bestowed upon another; this was more than he could bear comfortably. If Sir Galahad loved the maiden, or if the maiden loved him, Tom had no hope. In either case, his honor would not allow him to try his own chance of winning, for Tom was generosity itself, and had not adopted the homely philosophy that "All things are fair in love and war."

Tom had, during the summer that was past, spent several weeks with the sister who had inspired his conception of an ideal woman. One day she had a sisterly talk with him with regard to marriage.

"Tom, dear," she asked, as she stroked his wilful locks that she thought very beautiful, "do you know you are keeping some woman away from true happiness when you refuse to marry?"

"When I can find a woman like you, Gracie, I'll lay my heart at her feet—a whole heart it shall be, too, dear, I assure you," said Tom as he imprisoned the little hand. Then he impatiently pulled a red rose from the climbing branch, threw the torn petals to the wind and said, "To tell the truth, Gracie, I've been about to cry 'Eureka' a half-dozen times, and have been forced into a seeking attitude by an inward glance at my ideal."

"Oh, Tom," the sister answered with blushing face, "you do not mean that your sister, with her simple manners and plain tastes, can compare with the cultivated women you meet."

"Cultivated! I believe there's the trouble," replied he. "I've often thought that if I could meet one with a natural refinement of soul before the cultivation had begun its work, I might have some hope of seeing my ideal realized."

"Oh, Tom, Tom, are you the one who used to take delight in telling what advantages you would give the lady of your choice? Are you the young man who has been made miserable all his life by the lack of culture in women?"

"Oh, Gracie! Cannot you understand that it is the something that goes by the name of cultivation, and not the real thing that I detest; I hate this something because it takes the sweet natural instincts and spoils them beyond recognition. You know what I mean, sister, and you know what many of the accomplishments, so-called, of ladies mean oftentimes."

No more was said between the two upon the subject, and the summer's vacation was gone, it seemed to the worshipful brother, before he had time to really get into the enjoyment of it. And Tom strained his sister to his heart and gave her his last kiss, and she whispered, "Try, dear Tom, to find the ideal woman as soon as possible."

Two months later he received his invitation from Laurence Bowles to visit him in Danton. And Tom with the knowledge of the Shoreton affair! Something in the letter of his friend Laurence told Tom that Sir Galahad was still in character, and that he was wearing all the ladies' sleeves of his congregation upon his knightly helm. "Yes; I will go down and look after Sir Galahad," he whispered as he read the letter the second time in the privacy of his room. Tom had no idea of making the trip in his own especial interest, but as we have seen he was surprised to find in this quiet place the object of his long search.

Danton had been glorified by an unusually pleasant autumn, and its very last day seemed to be the crowning of its beauty. Tom rose in not very high spirits on this morning, for the day before had been Sunday, and he had observed much which had suggested a train of unpleasant possibilities. He saw in what a worshipful state the minister's congregation was; he thought of the little floweret who, like sweet Elaine, might have given her heart away, and was even then in her secret soul crying "him or death"—"death or him." If Sir Galahad should never find that the "floweret" was giving itself in all its sweetness to him, what would become of the floweret? And if Sir Galahad should take the flower to wear close to his ministerial heart would she not become a sacrifice to the Danton Church, with all its traditions and whims? Then how about the Miriam of Shoreton if the minister chose the sweet maiden of his flock?

As Tom brushed his chestnut locks, he was impatient with himself and with the world generally, yet he prodded his courage and found at last, as he usually did in a perplexity, a loop hole through which enough light entered to guide him away from a dungeon of despair. As he went down stairs he met Laurence, about whom were no signs of the "blue Monday."

"A glorious morning!" said the minister; "I want you to go out to the woods with me when the sun has warmed the world a little. The woods will surprise you, Tom."

After breakfast Tom went into his friend's study and talked for an hour, and in this talk he found an opportunity to give what he believed to be wholesome advice to his friend. Sir Galahad seemed to forget the presence of Tom, and broke out: "Oh, the need of souls! I am so inadequate as a help, comforter and guide! Sometimes when I feel my unworthiness for it all, I am tempted to flee from my duty; to shut myself away from it all; to lie before my God helpless and needy until He lifts me to a higher spiritual state, and I hear a new voice of consolation from Him. I know I am a coward at times, and I remember my consecration vow to spend and be spent for the people over which the Lord has placed me, but sometimes I feel, so to speak, that I am drained of every drop of sympathy, and even of spiritual vitality."

Tom's whole force of pity was roused in the interest of his friend and of what he believed to be common sense as he asserted, "The Lord never intended, Laurence, that a man should go to the martyr's stake a minute before He called him; most of us are not ready to go at the call. You must excuse me, my dear fellow, if I speak plainly and, as it may seem, intrusively. But I think the people of your church have gone hungry for sympathy so long that they are now as ravenous as wolves when they have a chance to appease their hunger, and they are preying upon your vitals. In common language, they are absorbing all your magnetism and threatening to disable you mentally and physically for a long life of service. They believe it is God towards whom they stretch their hands, but let me say that in a majority of cases I believe the yearning goes only as far as your worthy self inspires it."

The brown eyes of the minister opened with a child-like surprise, though he uttered not a sound, while the friend like a persistent surgeon went on, though noticing a growing expression of pain about the well-formed mouth. "You need a wife, Laurence; a young minister with your gift of magnetic sympathy will be misunderstood even when full of sacrificial intent. You seem to sympathize with each person especially; you are not conscious of it, but you will surely dishonor the cause that you are willing to sacrifice all to honor!"

"Oh, God! What do you mean, Tom? What have you noticed?" cried the minister, as he rose and stood before his friend.

"Dear Sir Galahad," said Tom, "don't, I pray, look at me in that way; if you do I shall hang myself for cruelty; but really, Sir Knight, I have known ever since I heard you were going into the ministry that you would get into trouble through your unselfishness and high conceptions of service. You don't know anything of the world, Laurence. You need a wife. A woman understands women. She could help you in a thousand ways; she would show you when to reserve your sympathy and when to bestow it. She would help you to see that the demand should not be so great that it would drain your vital forces. In short, she would not allow you to be spoiling character by coddling infirmities!"

As Tom pronounced the last word of his speech a knock at the study door was heard, and Sir Galahad, alert for duty, rose and answered the call, saying to Tom as he did so, "I invited Miss Marshall to walk with us to the woods. You will go with her, without me."

Tom went out as one of his friend's flock passed in. He and Anise were soon on the road towards the woods. Tom, the free, joyous, effervescing Tom, was for once reserved and silent—his secret was his burden. The two walked on, with only an occasional word between them, until they reached the forest path so well known to Anise; then a change came over the maiden; she seemed to declare by her manner, "I am with my old friends; they understand me; I can be myself with them." And this manner was contagious; her companion forgot his awkward reticence, he looked about him upon the forest display, he gave himself up to the influence of nature.

They came to the spot—was it temple or consecrated shrine?—where Laurence Bowles had on his ordination morning bowed his soul before God, which had afterward opened itself widely as never before to the charms and sweet influences of nature. The young man and maiden seated themselves upon a fallen tree, and Tom abandoned himself to the influences of the place and of the hour. He quoted bits of poetry and of philosophy, even sang a snatch of a song. Old Nature had adjusted conditions in a way quite congenial to him, and he was showing his gratitude in a characteristic way. Anise was experiencing a revelation. She raised her lovely, asking eyes to Tom's face, unconscious that they told her secret, and Tom caught the meaning of the expression. It was not the look he had seen her cast upon Sir Galahad—that might have been the look of an angel upon a higher order of spiritual embodiment. This was the look of a woman who had found her ideal.

What more was said Tom could not remember, even to tell his sister Grace ever so incoherently, but he knew coming out of the woods, knew by occult signs that Anise Marshall loved him as he had waited to be loved, and that she was the sweet wild flower for which he had long been searching.

When the two reached the Widow Marshall's gate, Laurence Bowles was waiting for their return to speak a few words with Tom. When Anise had entered the house and the two were alone, the minister said to his friend: "I feel that I must have a talk with you. I think that you judge from the outside with regard to my service; one who has given himself to a cause must see his duty with regard to it quite differently from one who is trying to see affairs in the light of friendship. 'To spend and be spent,' was my consecration vow. As I have told you, I cannot make myself see another standard than this. But I came out really to speak of a purpose with regard to the young lady whom I met at Shoreton. I have seen no one who seems better fitted for service as a minister's wife. I have laid it all before the Lord, and I think my way is clear to marry if I find the young lady willing. My mother and my people, I feel sure, would think the lady worthy of the calling."

"Your mother and your people! Are you mad, Laurence Bowles?" Tom found breath to articulate. "What have they to do with the interests of your heart? In the name of reason, let your heart speak for once, Laurence! Forget for a moment that you have a church or a life purpose. I don't ask you to ignore your accountability or service to your God. I ask you to allow your God-given instincts a fair chance, and thus to glorify your life purpose the more!"

There was a look of pain upon the minister's face as he replied in a tone of sadness, "But you do not understand. I am a pledged man—" and just here a parishioner met them with a story of spiritual want, and Tom returned to the house alone. Tom Hyr felt that he must accept the conclusion with regard to his friend, that he had so crucified his natural instincts that when he came to the hour which should have been a supreme one in his experience, his heart had not sprung to it, and all because some one had made a mistake in his training. He decided that he could do no more toward helping his friend to a more healthful state of feeling, and that he would trust to the influence of the lady at Shoreton to bring him to a more reasonable state of mind. Having dismissed his friend's affair from his especial concern, he opened his own heart to let in the flood of joy that surged toward its citadel. He was loved! he felt sure of it. But he had not told his love in words, though he knew that his soul was persistently urging its claims. His honor said "No! Wait your time! Do not take advantage of this mood! She has not seen the world. You must be chosen from among men!"

Tom Hyr did not reason then that the world of lovers would have called him insane to let such a rare moment pass unimproved, and some even would have thought him as peculiar as he thought his friend Laurence Bowles.

He went into the house and was met in the hall by Mrs. Marshall, who invited him into the parlor to talk, as she said, "about city schools." She told the young man her purpose to give her daughter a chance at a "first-class school," and mentioned to him that it had been the desire of her husband that his child should be well educated. Tom was just the one to talk with, for who could have been more interested in the young lady's future at that moment than was he? Mrs. Marshall found him quite willing to discuss the merits of separate institutions of learning, and when she informed him of her idea of sending Anise to Boston to a cousin of the family, Tom favored it at once. Now Tom himself had relatives in Boston, and nothing is impossible to a lover, and by the time Mrs. Marshall had spoken another sentence he had in anticipation made a dozen visits thither.

Can the Standards of Our Church Be Changed?

Abstract of a Paper Read Before the Pastors' Association, April 12th, 1886, by Rev. Geo. D. Hulst.

BY Standards we mean, 1st, Our doctrinal Standards; 2d, Our compulsory Liturgy.

I. To the question we answer, yes.

The Standards are a part of the Constitution of the Church. In proof of this we have: 1. The declaration of the Convention which received them as the Standards of our Church. Min. I., p. 217, 218. Const. Orig. Pref., p. 9. 2. A deliverance of the Church. Digest, Chap. II., p. 6. 3. Legislation based on this fact. Pref. to Liturgy, 1883, p. 5–6. 4. Negative declaration, the Church not allowing changes save by authorized methods. Action of Synod, 1875. This belief has been the belief of the Church of the Netherlands as well.

To change the Standards we have only to follow the method of the Constitution, Art. XV., Sec. 2

This has been done by the Church. 1. By allowing, without rebuke, tentative efforts. 2. By making minor changes. 3. By making additions. This has also been done by the Church of the Netherlands, notably at the Synod of Dort.

II. The Church in receiving the Standards as a part of the Constitution has taken the only course of wisdom and safety. The compulsion of our belief and use rests upon the mandatory clauses of the limited Constitution. But these may be changed. Then there may be silence, with belief and use made voluntary, or there may be denial, with belief and use forbidden. As a part of the supreme law, the Standards have the utmost possible sanctity.

A change under the Constitution nominally requires a majority vote, but by such methods, covering so long a time, that, as history proves, no change can be made till the Church is practically a unit in desiring it. Changes are rarely discussed till a large minority, at least in heart, favor. Surely the belief of the minority ought not to hold in bondage the great majority.

But, some of our ministry believe the opinion and practice of the Church have been incorrect. The report of the Committee on Overtures at the General Synod of 1885 is in this line, and probably states in brief all that can be said in favor of the immutability of our Standards. To show the truth, we will point out the fallacy of that argument.

I. An argument is advanced that the Standards were adopted by general conventions of the Church in 1771 and 1792, and can be changed only by corresponding conventions.

This argument is not valid. 1. These conventions did not form a new Church, but reasserted existing beliefs for special purposes. In 1771, to obtain Classical powers. In 1792, to nationalize the Church.

2. These conventions, not being recognized by the Constitution under which the ministry lived, had no authority and could give none. But if they had any authority, by a law universally recognized, the body organized by them took all the authority they possessed for the purposes for which they were gathered. Moreover, our General Synods till 1812 were general conventions, and are still such representatively.

3. The argument if valid, defeats its aim. For what these conventions adopted was not the Standards, but, in the same resolution and sentence, the Rules of Government of the Church of the Netherlands. One has as much sanctity as the other.

II. Next it is argued that the Standards are the "bed rock expression of the Unity of Evangelical Protestant Christendom," adopted unanimously by all the delegates at the Synod of Dort. The Rules of Order, etc., were among the post acta of that Synod, and bound the Church of the Netherlands only.

This argument is not valid. 1. It makes a mistake in its premises, for the Standards are not the expression of the unity claimed. More than half of the Protestant world—nearly half of the Protestants of the Netherlands—were not represented in the Synod.

2. The Synod of Dort was in no sense anything but a national Synod. a. This is what the Calvinists asked for, and the Arminians opposed. b. This is what the States-General granted permission to hold. c. No Church but that of the Netherlands had a voice in its call. d. The delegates from other churches were mostly appointed by political authorities, the churches as such having no voice in accepting the invitation or appointing representatives, and so the delegates from England, e. g., represented James I., but did not voice the opinions of the Church of England. e. The acts of the Synod did not bind any other church represented, and were, so far as we can learn, not adopted by any other. f. The Synod itself claimed to be national, and disclaimed being ecumenical. g. The post acta were done in the same body—with the same organization and officers, by the same voters, with the same authoritative, ecclesiastical and political endorsement, as were any other acts of Synod. h. If the view of the report be correct then the Canons alone have special authority, for it was not intended to take up the Confession or Catechism in the presence of the visiting delegates. i. The decisions of the Synod were unanimous because delegates known to be Arminian, (e. g., Episcopius,) were not allowed to take their seats, and those who disagreed with what the Synod met to enforce, (e. g., the delegates from Utrecht,) withdrew from the body. For proof of all these positions, vide Synod of Dort's "History of Preceding Events."

3. If the argument of the report be correct, the Synod of Dort could not change the Confession adopted at the first General Synod, Wesel, 1568 But it did do so pretty thoroughly.

4. The report asserts that Creeds and Confessions are the truth upon which the Church rests. On the contrary, there has been no Creed nor Confession except as an organized Church has made it. Organization is first, then a statement of God's truth as believed. The power that makes can unmake.

III. The report argues that Creeds and Confessions cannot be altered by majorities, and the assent of minorities be forced. 1. Then the Synod of Dort did wrongly. 2. Then no additions can be made to Standards. Additions modify old ideas, else they are repetitions. 3. If people differ, one or the other must be forced. The majority is not the party to yield.

IV. Our Standards, it is argued, are binding by reason of common consent, and unless the individual agree to change, the rights of the individual are invaded. By no means. The common consent is based upon the signing of the ministerial formula. But 1. This is a part of the limited Constitution, and in signing there is common consent to the fact that this may be changed. The consent is to abide by the Constitution, and by changes, properly made under the Constitution, in it and all it includes. 2. Nothing is taken from the obligation of common consent, if any assertion of doctrine be dropped. No one is compelled to deny, because he is not compelled to believe. 3. By the formula itself a minister may change his views. And if, on his confession, Classis take no action, he is free to hold to the change.

V. But, it is asserted, our Creeds and Confessions should remain in our books, as showing our historical development as a Church, though recognized as no longer necessary nor vital. But 1. Our books are neither mummy cases nor graveyards. 2. The Church can print what she pleases to print. 3. In loyalty to God she must declare, as she views it, God's truth and no more. What is true becomes error when non essential or no longer vital, by its place or assertion, it is given an importance it ought not to possess. 4. Our Church goes back to Pentecost. The ancient creeds she believes in, she yet retains; but the creeds of our Church under the papacy she has cast out, and we say, Amen!

Leaving the report, the power to change Standards rests with the Church, from the very nature of things. Remonstrants and Contra-remonstrants both acknowledged it (vide "History of Preceding Events"), and every church of God believes it. The only thing immutable is God's Word. As man is, and as history has been and shall be, Standards must be changed. Words have new meanings, new idioms express thought, and in time, as in the Authorized Version of the Bible, words often exactly contradict what was intended. Moreover, new issues are developed, new errors confront the Church. Satan did not spend all his time on the bread temptation. And yet again, God's Spirit is always with the Church; and for man's welfare and God's glory, He may reveal new things out of the Word, which may modify the old. And the Church must express the truth only—clearly, and so that neither saints nor sinners may need an explanation of what is intended.

Ought our Standards to be changed?

1. Changes should be made carefully, lest the wisdom of the fathers be lightly regarded.

But, 2. The Church cannot declare what she does not believe, or what she knows is not vital, lest she cause a more fatal irreverence, viz., that as she allows that some doctrines need not be interpreted as the words plainly mean, men conclude and properly, they have a corresponding license with regard to any expression of doctrine. A confession open to individual interpretation, immutable only in verbiage, becomes the softest kind of putty.

Note 1. Creeds and Confessions uttered in the heat of controversy will by necessity utter with prejudice, with too much of emphasis and with too much of detail, the points at issue. Hence, 2. Every Creed and Confession should be modified after the Church, separated from the conflict, is calm. 3. Doctrines backed up by Bible texts are not necessarily true, vide Matt. 4:1-7. 4. Upon matters merely intellectual, men will neither universally nor permanently agree. So far as Creeds and Confessions are expressions of intellectual subtilties, they will challenge criticism, invite conflict and necessitate change, as the world waves of thought move on.

In Standards there must be change or there will be the freedom of individual interpretation. Churches must make their choice. Standards, however, should not be banners to march under, but truths in which to believe, and by which to live.

In our own, it might be as well for the Church to say what she means, so that one who is only a Christian, not a theologian as well, may understand. It might be as well to have less of the intellectual, more comparatively of the spiritual; less of anatomy, more of the man living and breathing in Christ Jesus. It might be as well not to have matters shaped so we cannot exemplify the following illustrations of charity: Phil. 1:15-18, Luke 9:49-50.

Our Book-Shelves.

....“HISTORICAL LIGHTS.” Compiled by Rev. Charles E. Little. The full sub-title indicates the character and design of this “volume of six thousand quotations from standard histories and biographies; and twenty thousand cross references with a general index, and index of personal names. These extracts consist chiefly of facts and incidents, and are designed for those who desire ready access to the events, the lessons, and the precedents of history in the preparation of addresses, essays, and sermons, also in pleadings at the bar, in discussing political issues, and in writing for the press.”

The compiler displays extraordinary talent and tact in the preparation of books of this kind, as all who have examined the companion volume, “Biblical Lights and Side Lights,” can testify. This encyclopædia of illustrations has its place and use, and will be found a help in the class of work which it is designed to facilitate. So many are the calls upon public speakers, and men in the professions for addresses of all kinds, and essays on varied subjects; so much is there to do in this line, and so short is the time in which it must be done, that ready access to encyclopædias of general information and specific illustration is well-nigh indispensable. The temptation to be avoided from books of this class is the verbatim use of their contents. This volume has two prominent merits that commend it,—the accuracy of the incidents can be easily verified, and the facts are put in such a way that whoever makes use of them is obliged to clothe them largely in his own language. It is a work carefully executed. (Funk & Wagnalls.)

....“HISTORY OF RUSSIA.” By Alfred Rambaud. Translated by L. B. Lang. The publisher has conferred a great favor on multitudes of readers who have been unable to obtain the expensive editions of this reliable and altogether excellent work. We have here a convenient, tasty and inexpensive reproduction of a complete history of a country and people about whom there has been more speculation than knowledge. It is well worthy the careful perusal of every student of history, and even the general reader cannot fail to find it delightful reading; for the beginning is on the border, if not within the realm of romance, and the facts are gathered and arranged so faithfully and carefully that the interest increases with the development, as we learn to admire the stern manhood and unselfish zeal displayed in the early attempts to unite under one common government those wild bands that roamed over the vast plain swept by the Polar winds. The author clearly portrays how from primitive Russia came forth “Princely Russia,” which received Christianity and developed rapidly until torn by internal strife and oppressed by repeated invasion. Then came “Muscovite Russia,” with her warriors, to prepare the way for “Peter the Great” to raise the nation to a position from which it could command the attention of the world. After him arose a line of empresses followed by emperors, who, by a bold and aggressive policy, have made Russia what she is to-day. There is no history of this mighty empire to compare with this in its completeness, reliability and exceedingly moderate cost. The immense sale it has had already should be but a beginning of the demand for such a work. (John B. Alden.)

....“FOREWARNED—FOREARMED.” By J. Thain Davidson. This series of addresses to young men deserves a large parish of readers. It is a heart-book, pulsing with feeling; and the advice and the warning given so attractively and so graciously, with such good taste and judgment and eloquence, cannot fail to be effective. The twenty addresses are like the lamps on the projecting masts of the wrecked “Oregon,” giving light and warning, showing the path of danger and the way of safety at the same time. The subjects discussed by the careful author are of especial interest to the young, who being forewarned are forearmed. (A. C. Armstrong & Son.)

....The seventh volume of Dr. Whedon’s Commentary on the Old Testament has just been issued. It embraces “ISAIAH,” by H. Bannister, D.D., and “JEREMIAH AND LAMENTATIONS,” by F. D. Hemenway, D.D. All three of these Christian scholars have died since their work was put in type and before the final proof-reading. The notes are brief, critical and practical, evangelical and well adapted for general circulation, as well as for ministers who have not access to larger works. Two other volumes, on The Pentateuch, and on Ezekiel, Daniel and the Minor Prophets, are well advanced toward publication. (Phillips & Hunt.)

....“CHRIST AS A TEACHER.” Two Lectures by M. R. Vincent, D.D. One does not wonder that the hearers of these lectures desired to see them in print. Dr. Vincent is so incisive and clear and suggestive that an old theme in his hands takes on new life and force. He shows how Christ was dogmatic and a systematic teacher, a questioner, an illustrator and a narrator. Sometimes things are pushed a little, but on the whole no Sunday-school teacher can turn these pages without receiving marked benefit. (Randolph & Co.)

....The “ESSENTIALS OF ELOCUTION,” by Alfred Ayres, is a very sensible little book, giving in small compass what is required for good speaking. His objurgations on the ordinary elocutionary manuals are well deserved. (Funk & Wagnalls.)

....Another small volume, “HINTS ON LANGUAGE,” by S. A. Bent, offers suggestions as to the best way of teaching in primary schools the proper use of words. The hints are well chosen and useful. In one of the examples a dromedary is said to differ from a camel in having but one hump, which is not true. The only difference is that the dromedary is trained to speed and the camel not. (Lee & Shepard.)

....The “MEMOIR OF MRS. EDWARD LIVINGSTON,” by her grand-niece, Louise Livingston Hunt, is a small but highly readable volume. Louise Davezac, the daughter of a wealthy planter of St. Domingo, at the age of thirteen became Madame Moreau, and soon after a widow. Later, compelled to exile by the slave insurrection which swept over her native island, she sought refuge in New Orleans, where for a time she lived in comparative poverty. At nineteen she married the eminent lawyer who became successively U. S. Senator, Secretary of State, and Minister to France.

The history of her experience during the time when New Orleans was threatened by the British in the War of 1812, of her quiet life on the banks of the Hudson, or her more active one in Washington and at the court of Louis Philippe, is fraught with interest. The reader is led, however, to wish that it had been given more in detail, and looks in vain for a portrait of the admirable woman whose appearance he is left to imagine by the sole help of the writer’s art. (Harper & Brothers.)

....“MABEL’S SUMMER IN THE HIMALAYAS,” by Mrs. Helen H. Holcomb, of Allahabad, is a very sweet story for little girls. As may be inferred from the title, it describes the happenings of a child’s life during a protracted stay in the mountains of northern Hindostan. Very naturally, a good deal of information is given in regard to the scenes and customs of the country. This is done so wisely and winsomely that the book commends itself to the attention of parents, Sunday-school teachers, and leaders of mission circles. (Pres. Board of Publication.)

....“A DAUGHTER OF FIFE.” By Amelia J. Barr. We confess to having been very much pleased with this simple story of Scottish life. It is, without qualification, pure and healthful in tone, elevated in sentiment, and written in an attractive style, the charm of which is heightened by the judicious use of the Scotch “dialect.” Some of its incidents may, perhaps, be improbable, and some of its characters overdrawn, especially that of the pragmatic and self-sufficient and altogether disagreeable student of theology. But there are others whose graceful beauty and unselfish nobleness make ample amends (Dodd, Mead & Co.)

Our Library Table.

Periodicals, Serials and Notes.

....Let it be said once for all that The Book Buyer is in the first place a monthly critical record of the newest books in English. One of the attractions, added this year, is the insertion of specimen engravings from some of these books. There are also paragraphs and brief articles relating to literary and artistic affairs. The portrait in the May number is of Mr. Brander Matthews. The first article is the usual London Notes, glancing with a kindly but somewhat critical eye at English books and art, and condensing very agreeably incidents occurring in the world of letters. Lawrence Hutton gives his fourth paper on Some American Book-Plates. The resolution to build a Congressional Library brings out a suggestive paper on the construction of libraries, usefully illustrated. Mr. Dunn’s book on Indian Wars receives a special notice which is generously illustrated. (Scribners.)

....One naturally looks inquiringly into The English Illustrated Magazine for another installment of the amusing and artistic illustrations of the Spectator. Much to his gratification he finds again a series of drawings by Hugh Thomson in the May number. In Umbria, Part 1, a description of Perugia, by Katharine S. Macquoid, with engravings from drawings by Thomas Macquoid, gives information in regard to a city done by some travellers in a few hours and by most American tourists not visited at all. J. Fitzgerald Molloy sketches very agreeably the life of the famous Nell Gwynn, and Mr. G. E. Lodge contributes an interesting essay on Bird-Life in South Sweden, which he also illustrates. The stories are My Friend Jim, by W. E. Norris, and the Unequal Yoke, by an anonymous writer. The frontispiece, May, from a painting by J. MacWhirter, is a beautiful picture.

....To show that the issue for May of The Popular Science Monthly is an unusually valuable one, it is only necessary to repeat the titles and names of the authors of some of the articles it contains. Photographing the Heavens, by Dr. Hermann Y. Klein, illustrated, opens a field full of wonders. The Difficulties of Railroad Regulation, (by law,) by Arthur T. Hadley, is helpful. Herbert Spencer’s second paper on The Factors of Organic Evolution declares what we all wish and need to know, whether we accept evolution or not. No man can give better counsel in regard to The Care of Pictures and Prints than Philip Gilbert Hamerton. The portrait and biography is of Francis Galton. These are specimens of the thirteen papers. The usual editorial departments follow, with their usual mass of important facts and brief dissertations.

....The Methodist Review for May contains a fair statement of Educational Work by the Methodist Episcopal Church in the South, appreciative articles on F. D. Maurice and Agassiz, and a careful review by Prof. H. M. Baird of Schliemann’s Tiryns. The Editorial Miscellany is rich and varied, and, as usual, full of life.

....The New Englander for May has a very clever jeu d’esprit on Dr. Hale’s reasons Why he is a Unitarian. It borrows his story of “My Double,” and applies it to his article with the sharp wit of Pascal. Another paper compares the Ethics of Christianity with those of Confucius learnedly and fairly; and the last one draws the consequences which logically follow from Mr. John Fiske’s Admission of Personality. In the Educational Department is given President Porter’s graceful tribute to the memory of Prof. Thatcher, which is followed by some keen remarks of D. H. Chamberlain on the Elective Policy of Yale and the Constitution of its Corporation.

....Scribner & Welford send us the Monthly Interpreter for March and April. They contain Canon Rawlinson’s Introduction to Isaiah, Prof. Reynolds on the Fourth Gospel’s Peculiarities, Deane on the Difficulties of Scripture, papers by Sayce and Prof. A. B. Bruce, and a sharp criticism on Cave’s Introduction to Theology. This magazine is well worthy of the attention of Biblical students.

AUNT MARJORIE'S CORNER

The Heart's Call.

BY EDITH M. THOMAS.

HE rides away at early light,
Amid the tingling frost,
And in the mist that sweeps her sight
His form is quickly lost.

He crosses now the silent stream,
Now skirts the forest drear,
Whose thickets cast a silver gleam
From leafage thin and sear.

Long falls the shadow at his back
(The morning springs before);
His thoughts fly down the shadowed track,
And haunt his cottage door.

Miles gone, upon a hilltop bare,
He draws a sudden rein:
His name, her voice, rings on the air,
Then all is still again!

She sits at home, she speaks no word,
But deeply calls her heart:
And this it is that he has heard,
Though they are miles apart.

A Few Words About Dress.

BY GERTRUDE L. VANDERBILT.

AT this season of the year what crowds of women flock to the fashionable shops of our large cities. They jostle and elbow each other to get a seat at the counter, and then they examine, select and purchase the articles spread before them with an avidity which is almost painful to witness. They behave as if this was the business of their lives—the important, the all-absorbing interest to which they must devote all their energies. The amount of time, thought and money spent upon what they shall wear in obedience to the prevailing fashion is appalling. We almost feel pity for their eagerness and are inclined to reason with them: Take no thought for your body what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than meat and the body than raiment? Why take ye thought for raiment?

On the street, in the cars, in the shops, everywhere we meet with over-dressed women. They flaunt their showy garments before those who are more modestly arrayed as if they felt that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like themselves,—they who spin not and who toil not.

There are wealthy women who expend enormous sums of money upon themselves in the matter of dress alone. What might they not do for others with these sums which they so selfishly expend upon the superfluities and luxuries which fashion demands of them. With so much suffering to be relieved, and, alas, so much sinning and so many wanderers to be reclaimed, is it not strange that women, sometimes those even who call themselves Christian women, can spend so much time and money upon mere personal adornment?

If the evil rested with themselves alone, we might feel that it does not concern us, but that is not possible. The effect of their example is like that of an infectious disease, it is caught by those with whom they come in contact; it passes on from one to another, each being infected with more or less virulence, according to character or habit.

If those who waste time and money upon their own adornment stood isolated in the world and without influence, we might pass them by in silent pity. But none are without influence, least of all those who are conspicuous for the money entrusted to their keeping.

Do such say, "That is their look out, not mine. I am not answerable for other people. If they copy me in what I do it is their fault and not mine."

Is not such reasoning in the spirit of Cain's reply to God, "Am I my brother's keeper?"

Even Christians, and the daughters of those professing to be Christians, do not find it beneath them to follow the extravagancies of fashion.

Observe,—we do not say merely fashion, for there may be common sense in fashion, but we refer to those extravagant and absurd lengths to which fashion leads her foolish votaries. Both Peter and Paul urge that "women adorn themselves with modest apparel."

That is not asking too much of a Christian woman, surely. But fashionable society, in what is absurdly styled "full dress," requires a woman to expose her back, her bosom, her arms, her shoulders in a manner that is anything but modest. Some of these fashions are set in Paris by females of most questionable reputation; it is a pity that our pure American girls should accept them. We are glad that the lady presiding at the White House, at the head of American society, has spoken a word against such a style of dressing.

If Christian women would conscientiously endeavor to dress on all occasions not only modestly, (they surely ought to be willing to do that,) but unostentatiously, their example would do much to spread the fashion of simplicity in dress among those who cannot afford to do otherwise, and yet who bend all their energies to dress better than they can afford.

Pride of personal appearance seems so inborn in some women that they will almost sacrifice their own souls and the souls of their children to it. How else can we account for it that they will stay away from church, and keep their children away from Sunday-school, not because they are without clothing, but because that which they have is not new nor fashionable.

If it could be established as an American custom to dress tastefully, I am willing to concede even handsomely, but always modestly, unostentatiously and without going into any of the extremes of fashion, how much good would be done in the example to poorer women.

It seems to me that the pockets of some men must be drained to keep their wives in the showy costumes in which they appear in public. Some fathers must almost dread to have their little daughters grow up, in view of the strain which will be imposed upon their pockets to dress them like their associates. Ought this to be so? Does it not take much out of the sweetness of life? Do not these fashion-worshipping women make it possible for their husbands, like Chinese husbands, to dread the birth of a little daughter? If they ever do effect this much, they do it against the noblest affections of American fathers, for there are no men in the world so loyal, so loving, so tender, so true to their daughters as the Christian men of this country.

Oh, my sisters, shall you ever be guilty of causing pain and anxiety, gray hairs and wrinkles, to pamper your pride in the outward appearance of yourselves or your children? There have not been wanting instances where this insane love of showy dress has led to the tarnishing of a fair name. It has led to temptations which have ended in bankruptcies. It has tampered with uprightness and integrity, it has been at the foundation of fraudulent transactions. It has been the harrassing desire of many a man to give his wife and his daughters the means to shine in society—to "appear well" they call it—when already he is taxed to the utmost to supply their real wants. What room does this leave for the charities of life that open the heart, for the duties that expand the soul!

I have been told by young women in reply to such statements that they are misrepresentations; that men spend their money on cigars, at the club and in various other ways. I am glad to know that women are not to blame, but it is not apparent yet to everybody; appearances at least are against many of them.

The working classes spend far more, in proportion to their means, than do wealthy people. It is in the benefit to them we find a strong argument for simplicity in dress. They consider dress as the measure of social rank. It is the tape line which they hold before every girl and woman they meet, by which to measure her value.

You may any day see working women who spend all their hard earned wages in feathers and (cotton) velvet. Out of two small rooms at $5 per month will come young women dressed like those who have an income of $1,000 per annum.

You know, and I know, people whose children are gaily decked in silk and lace, who would refuse you fifty cents for charity if you passed the subscription list to them, with the plea that they could not afford to give anything. Such offer sacrifices to the god of this world, but what treasure are they laying up in heaven?

Let us at least have simplicity in dressing our children. What is more lovely than a pretty child simply dressed? Yet we even make our little girls uncomfortable by our endeavor to make them fashionable. Have you not seen a woman pile up a pyramid of feathers and bows upon a velvet bonnet to bury the child's head under? Poor little thing, how uncomfortable it looked!

The more grotesque a fashion is, the more eagerly some women run after it. Not long since a style of bonnet was in vogue, bent in the middle, and instantly every child looked as if the front of its bonnet was an acute angled triangle. Not long ago I rode in a car with a little girl whose ostrich feathers, sticking out in all directions, made her look like a small palmetto plant.

I have heard girls praised for working hard to dress up their younger sisters stylishly. It was a pity not to have had the time more judiciously spent, for the little sisters would certainly have looked better without the finery.

There is much deceit hidden under this love of dress. People wish to look richer, to be more showily dressed than they can afford. They wish to present the false appearance of riches which they do not possess. You ask a mother to send her child more regularly to Sunday-school. No, she cannot; she says that she has a proper pride to have her child look as well as someone else's child. The girl must stay at home until she can get some new clothes. No, mother, it is not "proper pride," it is a deceitful pride by which you wish to mislead people into thinking that your child is better off than she really is. You value her clothes more than her soul. When her body is laid in the grave and her naked soul stands before God, how will she appear then? Do not inculcate by word or deed the feeling that she may neglect the church or the Sunday school or any other means of grace because she is not clothed to satisfy your morbid pride, or the time may come when she will stand as your accuser at God's great judgment throne.

While condemning the bad taste of dressy women we must not be misunderstood. It is the duty of women to dress neatly and tastefully. Slovenliness in appearance is inexcusable. But women can be tastefully and becomingly arrayed without the constantly recurring outlay of time, labor and money spent in pursuit of every fleeting fashion.

Travellers sometimes tell us that our American girls are the prettiest in the world, and also that they dress in the best taste. We delight in hearing them praised; we admit that it is just. But these dressy women are not among the sweet, simple, intelligent girls thus spoken of. You generally find that these over-dressed women are not attractive; they strive to become so by arts which only render their want of taste and beauty more conspicuous.

If you would look into a mirror of vanity take up the fashion notes in some of the papers, where the caprices of style in dress are discussed as seriously as the solemn and momentous matters of life.

I find the following in one of the New York daily papers: "Emma Abbott describes one of her new dresses from Worth in the following manner: 'It is a pale pink brocade with rich crimson velvet roses, etc., etc....The waist is cut quite decollette, etc., etc....all my sleeves are made this way to display the prettiest part of the arm, which is the curve over the shoulder....I have a dress for a death-bed scene that one would almost love to die in, it is so beautiful.'"

Reader, do you want to know what is the fashionable dress for a death-bed? She tells you, "White crepe de chine with cascades of d'Alencon, and at the back a Watteau plait nearly covered with the same!"

But why, dear Aunt Marjorie, do we take up the space in your columns for this subject? It is not your readers so much as the gay people around us whom we wish to reach.

We hear a great deal about "how to reach the masses," and by that phrase we mean the poor. But it seems to me quite as hard to know how to reach the rich. Can it be done?

The Courage of Our Lord.

OFTEN has it seemed strange to us that the Son of Man should have avoided danger, should have retired in a desert place at the approach of persecution. Did He fear to die? No; He did not fear to die, but He was not afraid to live. There were times when to Him it would have been easier to die than to live, times when His heart threatened to break beneath the load of the burden laid upon Him. At such times He had but one fear—lest He should die ere He could bear His burden home. His courage was the patience wherewith He possessed His soul, His determination not to yield till His work was done, His resolution to survive, in spite of life's bitter cross, until He had carried that cross to its destined goal. What think you does He mean when He says: "I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened until it be accomplished!" He means that He needed patience to keep His heart from breaking, patience to live on till His baptismal hour. Ponder solemnly these wondrous words of the Epistle to the Hebrews: "Who in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears, unto him that was able to save him from death, and was heard in the thing he feared." "What?" you say; "heard in the thing he feared? I never knew that Christ's Gethsemane prayer was heard at all. Did not the cross come to Him in spite of His crying? Was He not called to die?" Yes; but the thing He feared was not death, but death before His work was done. He prayed to Him who was able to save Him from death, that He would save Him till His baptismal hour, that He would grant Him the strength to bear until He had borne His burden home. And verily He was heard in the thing He feared. The strength came to Him after the agony, and the Father's cup ceased to tremble in His hands. The strength came to Him, and the strong crying and tears fled away, and His will stood up erect in the garden and said: "If this cup may not pass away from me, except I drink it, Thy will be done." In that hour the cup did pass from Him, passed in the act of drinking it. The bitterness went out of it as He drained it to the dregs. The moment He gave His will to His Father, His Father gave Him back His will, and He was infinitely strong. In His patience He possessed His soul, possessed it not in mere resignation, but in acquiescence, in joyousness. He went out to meet His baptism with a light heart; He climbed the ascent of Calvary with a strong step—for it is the soul that makes the strength, and he who possesses the soul is master over all things. The memory of that self-possession was in the valley of the shadow the rod and staff that comforted Him; it was there that with His loudest, most triumphant voice, He cried, "It is finished." Think you it was only a child's joy that there was to be no more pain? No, it was a man's satisfaction that his work had been sustained to the end. It was the joy of knowing that He had never given in, never wavered from His purpose, never yielded to the storm. He had fought a good fight, He had finished His course, yet He had kept His patience; that was His crown of glory.

Strong Son of God, inspire us with Thy immortal love. Nothing but Thy love can make us strong; nothing but Thy love can help us to possess with patience our undying souls. Our life is too heavy for us without Thy life; our yoke is too weighty for us until it be added to Thine. We have been crouching sullenly beneath our burdens, and consoling ourselves with the thought of the silent tomb; we have been Romans in adversity; we have been cowards in the storm. Rise on us, Thou light of the valley, Thou star of Gethsemane; rise on us, that we may know what it is to have songs in the night, music in the silence, glory in the gloom. Breath on us Thy peace that passeth all understanding, that our hearts may be lit with Thy fire, warmed with Thy glow, cheered with Thy presence, vivified with Thy power. Help us to bear all things without ceasing, to hope all things, to be restful without apathy, to be calm without death. We shall possess our souls in patience when Thou shalt enter in; we dare not crucify the Lord of Glory.—Rev. George Matheson, D.D., in Good Words.

And I don't know what beside.
Oh, this horrid, horrid sum!
Right I cannot make it come."
So said Margy, with a sigh,
Crying, "'Tis no use to try."

Gray-haired grandma, sitting near,
Heard the sigh and saw the tear.
"Margy darling, hither come;
Let me see thy 'horrid sum.'"
Scanning all the work, she saw
Here a slip and there a flaw.
"Ah, my Margy, plain to see
Why the figures don't agree.
Little maid, thy sore distress
Is the fruit of heedlessness."

"Oh, but, grandma, I have tried Just as hard!" poor Margy cried;
"But the naughty figures go Somehow always wrong, you know."
Then, to her supreme dismay,
Grandma sponged the work away,
And, for Margy's eyes to read,
Wrote, in letters large and plain,
"IF AT FIRST YOU DON'T SUCCEED, TRY, AND TRY, AND TRY AGAIN."

When the wise old saw she read,
"Thank you, grandma dear," she said.
Then with bright and cheerful air
Worked the sum with double care.
And the answer—happy sight!—
Came at last exactly right.
"Now," the little maiden cried,
Laughing, in her girlish pride,
"When my naughty sums go wrong,
'TRY AGAIN' shall be my song."

A Meeting of Socialists.

THE tenth meeting of the P. J. S., or Particularly Just Society, was appointed for last Saturday afternoon. This society is composed of eight members, all zealous Socialists.

About four o'clock on that day five children, the oldest ten years of age, ran up the stairs of their minister's house, all calling "Elsie, Elsie, here we are!" And Elsie felt no inclination to dispute that statement.

"But," you ask, "what connection did they have with the Socialistic Society?" Just this—they were the members, and were doing their best to help others who had fewer pleasures than they. They have resolved, some of them at least, that when they grow up they will give a large per cent of their fortunes to poorer people, and they are now putting themselves in practice for future benevolence by doing the best they can with the material at hand.

President Grace Wharton, nine years old, called the meeting to order. Secretary Elsie, who is also a Committee of One on Business Arrangements, went to her desk and brought out six squares of muslin, each with a design for outlining drawn on it, and some pretty marking cotton. These the members, even Lester, the boy of five, are outlining for a poor woman's bed-quilt.

When all the needles were threaded—and some of the hands washed—President Grace called upon the Official Editor to read the last copy of the paper which they make up among them. As soon as this had been read the members begged for "just one more story," and the Editor read one that had been reserved for another issue of the paper. All this time the others had been steadily working.

After awhile, however, they suddenly stopped, for the Secretary went to a drawer, "stuck in her thumb" and pulled out, not a "plum," but a bag of cookies. This action caused a remarkable transformation, for those hitherto hungry for stories suddenly became voracious in another direction. Yet they were perfectly polite throughout.

During this interim the members, each of whom is trying to cure himself—or herself—of some one fault, talked over their success. The Socialists believe that inasmuch as "the whole is the sum of all its parts," the best way of reforming the world is by beginning upon those parts over which they have control.

After the work was again put in order, all of the hands having been washed this time, the Editor read the last story she had, stopping every little while to rethread needles, pick out misplaced stitches, and loosen "double threads." As soon as the Editor had finished that important business, one insatiable member asked her to make up a story as she went along. The President seconding this motion, the dutiful Editor was about to comply when she glanced at the clock. "Quarter of six!" was her exclamation. President Grace took her official position, hurriedly called the meeting to order, and after she had appointed the Saturday two weeks from date for their next meeting, this social and Socialistic gathering adjourned. Pierrot the Faithful.

I WAS hurrying along the Boulevard de Comcelles. A female rag-picker, pale and famished, led by the bridle a poor little donkey which seemed a hundred years old, and which dragged a poor little cart full of the rubbish of the street—rags, broken bottles, torn papers, worn-out skillets, crusts of bread—the thousand nothings which are the fortune of the rag-pickers. The woman had done good work since midnight, but the donkey was ready to drop. He stopped short, as if he had made up his mind to go no farther. His legs trembled and threatened a fall. He hung his head with resignation, as if awaiting the stroke of death.

The sight touched and arrested me. A man would have cursed and beaten the poor beast to arouse him; the woman looked at him with an eye of motherly pity. The donkey returned the look, as if saying, "You see it is all over. I have done my best for you night after night, because I saw your misery was greater than mine. You have treated me well, sharing your bread with me, and your neighbor's oats when you could get them; but I am dying at last."

The woman looked at him and said gently, "Come, come, dear Pierrot, do not leave me here." She lightened the load by taking out a basket of broken bottles. "Come now," she said, as if talking to a child. "You can get along nicely now." She put her shoulder to the wheel, but the donkey did not move. He knew that he had not strength to walk to St. Ouen, his wretched home. She still coaxed him. "How do you think we can get along this way, Pierrot? To be sure, I could drag the cart. But I can't put you in it, and you would be ashamed to be dragged after it." The donkey raised his ears, but no move.

I was going to speak to her when she ran into the nearest bake-shop. The donkey followed her with anxious eyes; he seemed fearful that he would die without his mistress. He was so little you would have taken him for a Pyrenean dog. He had grown gray in the harness. A few tufts of gray hair remained here and there on his emaciated body. He looked like a mountain burned bare in many places. His resigned air showed a mind free from worldly vanities. He was far past the age when one strikes attitudes. He was almost transparent in his leanness, but his face was all the more expressive. It had something almost human in its intelligence and goodness. Why had he been condemned to such suffering?

The rag-picker soon returned, bringing a piece of bread and a lump of sugar. The donkey turned and showed his teeth, like old piano keys. But although it was his breakfast time, he had no more strength in his mouth than in his legs. She gave him the sugar. He took it as if to oblige her, but dropped it again, and the same with the bread. "Ah, what shall I do?" said the rag-picker. She thought no more of her cart. She was full of anxiety for her friend Pierrot. "Pierrot!" she cried again. Two great tears came to her eyes. She took his head in her arms and kissed him like a child. The caress did what nothing else could do. The donkey roused himself and brayed as in his best days.

I approached and said to the woman, "You seem to be in trouble."

"Oh!" she said, crying, "if you knew how I love this beast. I saved him from the butchers four years ago. In those days I had only a hod. I have raised seven children with my hook. The father is gone and one other, and my eldest daughter was taken only a fortnight ago. It's no use, you can't take good care of them when you work in the streets all night."

One of my friends passed by. I said, "Let us buy this donkey and put him on the retired list. This good woman will take care of him. How much did the donkey cost?" I asked.

"Ten francs."

"Go back and buy another donkey, and take care of this one," I said, putting the money into her hand.

That evening the woman came to me in tears. I understood at once.

"Oh, sir, he is gone!"

"Poor Pierrot?"

"Yes, sir. We got to St. Ouen one way or another; but when he came in sight of our hut he fell on his knees. I tried to raise him up, but this time it was all over. Think of it! he wanted to die at home after finishing his day's work."—Johounot's Natural History.

Gamaliel G. Smith.

The Minister, Elders and Deacons of the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church of the City of New York

IN CONSISTORY, May 6th, 1886.

THE chair having announced the death of Gamaliel G. Smith, a member of this body, the following minute was adopted:

The Consistory record with emotion their sense of the loss incurred by the removal of Mr. Smith, who departed this life on the 30th of April. He had been in the full communion of our church for almost half a century, and during all this period he adorned the Christian profession by a life of unusual consistency, activity and usefulness. At an early period he came into the Consistory as deacon, and afterwards became an elder, and in both positions rendered services which in amount and character can hardly be overestimated. He was a wise counsellor in all temporal matters, and still more so in what pertained to the spiritual interests of the church, being habitually ready for every good word and work. He was for years a member of several of our most important committees, and as such exerted a wide and wholesome influence in shaping the policy and increasing the efficiency of the church.

Of his great usefulness to the denomination and to the church Catholic we do not here speak. It is enough to put on record our appreciation of his life work as a member and an office-bearer of the Collegiate Church.

While we sincerely mourn our sad bereavement, we bow in humble submission to the will of our Heavenly Father, and pray that He would sanctify the stroke to us all, so that, whether ministers, elders or deacons, we may be more diligent and faithful, and that when we die it may be said of us, as of our departed brother, that heaven is richer and earth poorer.

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing minute be sent to the family of Mr. Smith, and that it also be published in THE CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER.

GEORGE S. STITT, Clerk.

The Van Bunschooten Bequest.

ON page 370 of the Centennial Volume of the Theological Seminary at New Brunswick, is the following foot note by the editing committee:

"This clause has generally been thought to be incorrect, and that it should have read 'The commencement of which (i. e., the millenium) may be no farther distant than the present living.' We have found ourselves so far unable to examine the original document. But this much may be said in vindication of the clause as it stands: It is well known that in the early part of this century the opinion was extensively held that the millenium was not very remote. May not this munificent benefactor of the church have opposed this view, and have given his wealth to perpetuate a ministry which might be needed for generations?"

In looking over a bundle of papers kindly placed in my hands a few days ago by the Rev. Dr. W. H. Campbell, I was delighted to find the original paper in Mr. Van Bunschooten's own handwriting and dated June 9th, 1814. On this day the General Synod to which he communicated his intention was in session, and this was doubtless the paper which he presented to it. In it the word "no" is not to be found in the sentence referred to. The printed copies are therefore correct.

Gleanings from Our Exchanges.

We take from the Highland Democrat the following gratifying report concerning the Church at Peekskill, N. Y., furnished by a correspondent of that paper. Its present pastor, Rev. Henry De Vries, has been there about two years. He has been instrumental in gathering into the communion of the church 63 on confession, and 15 by certificate. Beside the two services on the Sabbath, he has a large Bible class of 40 members held in the church in the afternoon. The lecture room is well filled every prayer-meeting night. This is another improvement and speaks well for the spirituality of the church. Again, the Sunday-school has doubled its numbers, and 31 from the school have been received into the full communion of the church; the amount of their contributions last year was $104.74.

During the past year I have learned from reliable authority that this church has contributed $391 for benevolent, and 1,700 for congregational purposes; two years ago they only raised $18.25 for benevolent and $817 for congregational purposes. Two years ago there was a floating debt of $1,000 which has all been wiped out, and now the church expenses are all paid every month.

Sabbath Tracts.

TWO months ago notice was given that a lover of the Sabbath would send tracts on the observance of the Lord's day, gratuitously to those who would distribute them. Several applications were received and to each applicant specimens to be selected from were sent, accompanied with a postal card on which to designate the tract or tracts and number desired. As an answer has been received from only one applicant, it is feared that the packages were not received. Will the applicants kindly notify this office whether they received the packages mailed to them, and measures will be taken to correct any error that may have occurred.

An Oratorio.

EDITOR OF CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER: I was induced to purchase tickets for an oratorio to be sung at Chickering Hall for the benefit of the Loyal Legion Temperance Society. After entering the hall and purchasing an operetta, I found it was the oratorio of Mary Magdalen, who is the heroine, with our Saviour represented by a German tenor, also Mary and Martha, with Judas, as the characters. The text of the oratorio is in the style of French novels, in which the Saviour, denouncing the sins of others, welcomes Mary into the fold, while Judas appears as one of the worshippers. The whole affair is a representation in music of the German play of the Crucifixion, and seems to me an outrage upon the reverential education of our Christian people. The performance seems to have been endorsed by members of our churches who were there in numbers with bouquets for Mary Magdalen, etc. Is this to be the instruction of the children of our churches? I came out after the first part disgusted. H.

American Bible Society.

THE Board of Managers met at the Bible House, on May 6th, 1886, the Hon. Enoch L. Fancher, LL.D., President, in the chair.

Letters were presented from various foreign agents and correspondents. Mr. Milne had reached Curacoa on his way to Baranquilla, April 16th, having disposed of about 2,000 volumes of Scriptures in Venezuela. Dr. Bliss was at Port Said on the 12th of April, on his way to Syria.

Grants of books for benevolent distribution were made, to the value of $8,075 (including consignments to colporteurs and foreign agents), and $3,000 in funds were appropriated for foreign work; making the amount of funds pledged for work in other lands, during the present fiscal year, $178,658.

A beautiful marble bust of the late Mr. Frederick S. Winston, long a Manager and Vice-President of the Society, was presented, and on motion of James M. Brown, Esq., a resolution was adopted, returning the thanks of the Board to the donor, Dr. Winston, and it was directed that the bust and pedestal be placed in a conspicuous position in the Managers' Room, so long the scene of Mr. Winston's well-remembered and faithful services.

Upon the recommendation of the Committee on Finance, the resignation by Mr. A. L. Taylor, of the office of Assistant Treasurer, to which he was elected in 1869, was accepted, with the request on the part of the Board that for some time to come he will render such occasional assistance as may be called for.

The Committee of General Reference reported favorably upon the nomination of Mr. William Foulke, Jr., of New York city, as Treasurer of the Society, and he was unanimously elected.

The total receipts in April were $26,591. The issues from the Bible House in the same period were 97,389 volumes.

The entire circulation for the year ending March 31st, 1886, was reported to be 1,437,440, of which 584,603 were distributed in foreign lands.

A TENTATIVE EFFORT to unite most if not all the native Japanese churches in one organization, an attempt which we were informed two months ago the Japanese pastors were talking about, is now in progress. The Tokyo Independent of April 3d publishes the circular which has been sent to many of the native pastors, containing a doctrinal basis and an outline of the organization of a council with subdivisions. No names are appended to it and no one is mentioned as advocating it. But the fact that such a movement is on foot is significant. We hope to present the text of the circular in a week or two.

Financial.

TUESDAY, May 11th.

THE Associated Banks reported for the week, loans reduced $639,100, specie reduced $2,057,800, a gain in legal tenders of $1,025,800, and deposits declined $478,700. The surplus of reserve was diminished by $912 325, making it $11,112,525. Money at one time rose to 5 per cent, but the average rate was 2 1-2 on demand, and closed yesterday at 2 to 3 per cent on call. The Bank of England on Thursday raised its rate to 3 per cent.

Imports of merchandise at this port last week were valued at $7,982 947, and exports at $6,116,031. The export of specie for the week was $2,520,010 Sterling exchange was quiet yesterday at $4 87 for 60 day bills, and $4.89 1 2 for demand.

The grain market was depressed by the death of Mr. Woerishoffer, and the belief that he held some millions of bushels of wheat, which would be thrown upon the market. Foreign markets were reported firm. The visible supply in the United States and Canada is declining weekly by about a million of bushels. Quotations yesterday were: Wheat here 90 1-8, in Chicago 75 7-8; corn here 47 1-8, in Chicago 34 1 4; oats here 36 1 4, in Chicago 29. A fair demand for hay is reported and prices steady. Cotton quoted yesterday at close: May 9.18–20; June 9 24–25; July 9.33–34.

The Stock Market was unaffected by the death of Mr. Woerishoffer, and the tendency was to better prices in view of the settlement of labor troubles and the general prospect of better times.

Sore Eyes

The eyes are always in sympathy with the body, and afford an excellent index of its condition. When the eyes become weak, and the lids inflamed and sore, it is an evidence that the system has become disordered by Scrofula, for which Ayer's Sarsaparilla is the best known remedy.

Scrofula, which produced a painful inflammation in my eyes, caused me much suffering for a number of years. By the advice of a physician I commenced taking Ayer's Sarsaparilla. After using this medicine a short time I was completely

Cured

My eyes are now in a splendid condition, and I am as well and strong as ever.—Mrs. William Gage, Concord, N. H.

For a number of years I was troubled with a humor in my eyes, and was unable to obtain any relief until I commenced using Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has effected a complete cure, and I believe it to be the best of blood purifiers.—C. E. Upton, Nashua, N. H.

From childhood, and until within a few months, I have been afflicted with Weak and Sore Eyes. I have used for these complaints, with beneficial results, Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and consider it a great blood purifier.—Mrs. C. Phillips, Glover, Vt.

I suffered for a year with inflammation in my left eye. Three ulcers formed on the ball, depriving me of sight, and causing great pain. After trying many other remedies, to no purpose, I was finally induced to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and, three bottles of this medicine, have been entirely cured. My sight has been restored, and there is no sign of inflammation, sore, or ulcer in my eye.—Kendal T. Bowen, Sugar Tree Ridge, Ohio.

My daughter, ten years old, was afflicted with Scrofulous Sore Eyes. During the last two years she never saw light of any kind. Physicians of the highest standing exerted their skill, but with no permanent success. On the recommendation of a friend I purchased a bottle of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which my daughter commenced taking. Before she had used the third bottle her sight was restored, and she can now look steadily at a brilliant light without pain. Her cure is complete.—W. E. Sutherland, Evangelist, Shelby City, Ky.

The Church.

Sighing and Doing.

FOR affairs of this world or the next,
This maxim is useful and true,
And may help you, however perplext:
Give over your sighing, and do.

You need not take up the wrong end,
Nor puzzle to see the way through;
In the duty you now comprehend,
Give over your sighing, and do.

By climbing the very first hill,
You may soon be surprised by the view
Of a way ever waiting a will;
Give over your sighing, and do.

A New Enthusiasm for the Church.

BY REV. WILLIAM R. TAYLOR.

SOME one said to Archdeacon Farrar, during his recent visit to this country, that the great need of America was "a new enthusiasm." The desire, frequently expressed of late, for a great religious leader like Luther, or Wesley, or Whitefield, is a confession of a similar need in the Church; for great leaders and great enthusiasms always go together.

Can it be very wide of the truth to say that a new enthusiasm for the Church might be found in a deeper realization, on her part, of spiritual death as an actual and awful fact; in the stiffening of her belief that, through the damning power of sin, unrepented of, unforsaken, and unforgiven, souls may be, and are really lost? Theoretically, and perhaps actually, her belief in this doctrine has never weakened; but who preaches, who prays, who lives, now-a-days, as if it were true?

The idea of spiritual death is certainly basal in the Christian scheme, It is the background of Revelation. It is a great gloomy rock rising out of the sea of human history, about which all the lights of Inspiration are made to play. It was the moving occasion of the whole long series of events which issued in a completed redemption, and the command to make it known to the world. It is the implied correlative of the Gospel idea. As there can be no mountains without valleys, no height without depth, so there can be no salvation without perdition, actual or in prospect. You cannot save a man unless he is lost or in danger of being so. You cannot give him life unless he is dead or dying.

It is impressive to observe how this awful truth of man's peril lurks behind and beneath the sweetest declarations of Scripture concerning Christ's work. "The Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost"—then men are lost until they are found of Him. "God so loved the world that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish"—then those who do not believe do perish. "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus"—then there is condemnation to them who are not in Him. That human souls are lost through sin is a truth we cannot get away from until we get away from the Gospel itself.

St. Paul says, "The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men," that is, publicly, conspicuously, as if it were written in letters of flame on the sky. It is revealed in conscience. It is revealed in suffering. If every pain were given a voice what a cry would rend the heavens! The tears of men would make a briny sea.

But nothing makes perdition so believable and real, as the Christian's consciousness of the guilt and the destroying power of sin. Whatever others may feel and believe, WE—you and I—know that we need a Saviour. We are not surer of our own existence than we are that, without a Saviour to cancel our guilty record in some way, and to deliver us from the power and practice of sin, we could never see God's face in peace. Our record would damn us. Sin would rule us. We do not say this in a spirit of cant or mock humility. We do not say it because it is orthodox to do so, or even because the Bible affirms it. We know it. We have found it out for ourselves. It is one of those bottom facts which no subsequent knowledge or experience can change. Without a Saviour, we, at least, are lost. And we are compelled to believe the same of others; for "as in water face answereth to face, so the heart of man to man."

Is it a mistake to say that out of a deeper conviction and stronger appreciation of the reality and awfulness of spiritual death, there would be born in the Church a new enthusiasm? New, of course, relatively, not absolutely; for it would be the old original enthusiasm that first moved the heart of God, that brought Christ to the earth and to the cross, and that has fired the souls of His most valiant soldiers—the enthusiasm of Rescue. There is no enthusiasm more powerful and more contagious than this. A burning building, a choked mine, a shipwreck, a pestilence—anything that seriously endangers human life, never fails to evoke enthusiasm of the most heroic sort, and to enlist a host of rescuers.

All that the Church needs to-day for the stirring of a new and mighty enthusiasm, is a profoundly quickened perception of the fact that perdition is as real as salvation; that men and women are lost, as well as saved; that over against the life everlasting lies the death eternal; that on every hand are those whose lamps are going out in that blackness of darkness in which no light shall ever be struck.

Let the Church rid herself of crude conceptions of future punishment; let the all too numerous phenomena of spiritual degeneration and death be intelligently observed; let the astonishing agreement between Scripture and the latest generalizations of moral science, assisted by natural science, on this subject be noted, and the results given to the people. And there would soon be less dead orthodoxy; less show-work for ecclesiastical statistics; fewer churches run as social clubs; less frequent retreats from down-town districts; and once again we should see the whole of the Lord's host, leaders and ranks, aflame with the divine fire of rescuing love.

Golden Text.—"Wilt thou be made whole?"—JOHN 5: 5, 6.
CENTRAL TRUTH.—"I and my Father are one."—JOHN 10: 30.

INTRODUCTION.

THE expression "after this," with which this chapter begins, is exceedingly indefinite, and probably covers a period of several months, during which the circuit of Galilee, which occupies so large a place in the other Gospels, was made by Jesus and His disciples. The feast which called Jesus to Jerusalem at this time cannot be identified. Each of the more prominent festivals has its advocates, but the majority lean either to the feast of Purim or that of the Passover. The question is of minor importance, affecting only the chronology of Christ's ministry, especially the determination of its length. The site of the pool of Bethesda is equally uncertain. The fact is well substantiated that there is more than one intermittent spring or pool in the immediate vicinity of the city which might answer the conditions of our story. Dr. Robinson states that he saw the water rise in the pool of the Virgin a foot in five minutes, and was told that at some seasons of the year it rises two or three times a day. The passage explaining this phenomena is generally regarded as an interpolation and is omitted from the Revised Version, as giving only the popular theories and not a statement of fact. This event was one of the crises in Christ's life, as it aroused in the minds of the Jews a determination to kill Him. This determination grew in strength with each successive visit to Jerusalem, until it found its expression in the cry of the mob before Pilate's judgment-hall.

THE LESSON.

I. JESUS AND THE CRIPPLE.—VS. 5-9.

V. 5.—"And a certain man was there, which had an infirmity thirty and eight years." This man had spent an average lifetime under bondage to disease. If he was visited with this affliction as a specific consequence of some sin, he would be considerably past middle life at the time of Christ's coming. It is not necessary to suppose that he had frequented this pool all of these years, although the inference is plain that he had been there long enough to become thoroughly discouraged.

V. 6.—"When Jesus saw him lie." The question naturally arises, Was there anything in this man's case that determined Jesus to heal him while leaving the rest in their sicknesses? The simplest answer seems to be that this man's case afforded a striking illustration of the spiritual truths concerning sin and its cure by Jesus. "Wilt thou be made whole?" This question seems unnecessary and almost a mockery. What was the man there for but to be made whole? Yet from the tone of the answer it would appear that he had given up any very definite expectation of being healed, and had continued to resort there more from habit and desperation than from hope. Jesus evidently intended to arouse desire, which is the necessary forerunner of faith.

V. 7.—"I have no man....to put me in the pool." This man was sick, poor and friendless. There was no help for him in man. His discouraging tone receives an additional shade of sadness from the fact that he had become used to his desolate condition, and while not contented with it was yet undisturbed by it. He presents a striking portrait of the soul in the power of sin and death.

V. 8.—"Rise, take up thy bed and walk." If the question of Jesus had sounded strangely in this man's ears, how much more marvellous this command. Is this stranger making light of my infirmities, as if I could put them aside by mere force of will? How often have I struggled to stand upon my feet, only to fall to the ground a helpless, suffering body, a mere cumbrance to the earth. But the word was the word of the Creator. He who commanded darkness to become light, speaks health and strength to this poor cripple.

V. 9.—"Immediately the man was made whole." Recognizing the authority of Him who had spoken this strange command, he simply obeys, and in obeying finds the needed strength. Thus, and thus only can we obtain strength for duty, in the discharge of duty. "And on the same day was the Sabbath." The Pharisees had encrusted the Divine law of the Sabbath with such a mass of puerile regulations as to make obedience to their requirements a perpetual bondage. Jesus systematically met these traditions and disregarded them; but in no case did he make light of the command to keep the Sabbath day holy. His work of relieving the suffering was a sacred work which agreed with the purpose of the Sabbath as instituted for man's temporal as well as spiritual benefit.

II. THE JEWS AND THE CRIPPLE.—VS. 10-15.

V. 10.—"The Jews therefore said unto him." By Jews is probably meant the representatives of that intense Judaism which everywhere opposed the teaching and work of Christ. "It is the Sabbath day: it is not lawful for thee to carry thy bed." That this man had been marvellously healed made no impression on their minds, but to see him bearing upon his shoulder the light mattress or blanket that constituted his bed filled them with indignation. Nehemiah had forbidden the carrying of burdens on the Sabbath in order to put a stop to commercial transactions on that day, but probably had no idea that his rules would be subjected to such an absurd literalism as this.

V. 11.—"He that made me whole, the same said unto me, Take up thy bed and walk." This man's logic was simple and irresistible. If this stranger had authority over nature sufficient to restore health and strength, he must have authority over Jewish institutions sufficient to warrant obeying Him in this matter of carrying his bed.

V. 12.—"What man is that which said unto thee, Take up thy bed and walk." Note how persistently they evade the miracle and emphasize what they regarded as a desecration.

V. 13.—"He that was healed wist not who it was." His interview with Jesus had been so brief, and the change which had come to him had been so great, that he had not recognized Jesus, nor could he now describe his healer. Jesus sought to avoid unnecessary notoriety, which could only hinder His work.

V. 14.—"Jesus findeth him in the temple." His grateful heart prompted him to go to the house of God to acknowledge the great mercy that had come to him so unexpectedly. Here he again meets with Jesus, and is pointed to a higher blessing in a new spiritual life. It is not necessary to infer from the words of Jesus that his sickness had been the direct result of some specific sin, although such an interpretation is not improbable.

V. 15.—"The man departed and told the Jews that it was Jesus." Some have looked upon this act as treacherous. We see in it only a desire to settle the dispute as to the legality of his act. In his unsuspecting mood he thought that the mention of the name of Jesus would silence all cavil.

III. JESUS AND THE JEWS.—VS. 16-18.

V. 16.—"Therefore did the Jews persecute Jesus." It would seem as if they had brought Him before some tribunal to answer to the charge of Sabbath breaking. We have only the beginning of His defence in this matter before us in our lesson, but sufficient to see the character of His plea.

V. 17.—"My Father worketh hitherto, and I work." He thus describes God as spending His Sabbath, not in idle contemplation, but in seeking the welfare of His creatures, engaged in works of necessity and mercy; so He Himself was working not for gain or pleasure, but to do good.

V. 18.—"Therefore the Jews sought the more to kill him." They recognized the full force of the brief statement of Jesus, and saw that He claimed Divine authority for all that He did. There was such an emphasis upon the relation existing between Jesus and His Father that they could not but see that He claimed to be in a peculiar relation toward Him, and recognized in His words an assertion of His own essential Divinity. To have suffered such a statement to go unquestioned and unrebuked would have been to acknowledge Him as Messiah and LORD. From this time His doom was sealed in the persistent hatred of the Jews.

LESSONS FOR TO-DAY.

1. Recognize yourself in the description of the cripple.
2. Waiting brings no healing.
3. Men have neither sympathy nor help for suffering sinners.
4. Christ is moved toward you by your very helplessness.
5. You have been sick long enough; wilt thou be made whol

6. Jesus commands you to repent and forsake your sins.

7. His command brings power to those who attempt to obey.

8. He who heals your soul has the right to control your life.

9. Let the command of Christ counteract all criticism and scoffing on the part of the world.

Stanley.

FROM the inmate of a poor-house to an honored guest in royal palaces is considerable of a leap, but it is only one of many wonderful exploits in the life of Henry M. Stanley, the celebrated African explorer. When three years of age he was sent to a poor-house in Wales, remaining ten years. Then he ran away to sea and brought up in New Orleans, where a merchant took a fancy to the lad, adopted him and gave him his name. The man soon died, leaving no will, and young Stanley was again thrown upon the world. He spent a few years in the California mines, then entered the Confederate Army, was taken prisoner and afterwards enlisted as a Union soldier. After the war he was engaged by the New York Herald to go to the East and report a Turkish insurrection. Returning home by the way of England, he went to the Welsh poor-house where he spent his boyhood and gave the inmates a good dinner. Then the Herald gave him the grand commission to go and find Livingstone in the heart of Africa. The story of their meeting thrilled all Europe and America, and Stanley, returning to England with a great collection of Livingstone's lett and journals, was the guest of princes and nobles. If the boys want to know about the rest of his life, they must read Through the Dark Continent.—The Congregationalist.

YOU picture to yourself the beauty of bravery and steadfastness. You let your memory wander over in memory of martyrs who have died for truth. And, then, some little, wretched, disagreeable duty comes which is your martyrdom, the lamp for your oil, and, if you will not do it, how your oil is spilt! How flat and thin and unilluminated your sentiment about the martyrs runs out over your self indulgence!—Phillips Brooks.

THE best portion of a good man's life is his little, nameless, unremembered acts of kindness and love.—J. Walton

WE can do more good by being good than in any other way.—Rowland Hill.

Another Household Necessity.

MR. WILD, THE INVENTOR OF LINOLEUM, NOTES A DISCOVERY AS VALUABLE AS HIS OWN.

FIFTEEN or twenty years ago it was found that a floor-covering could be made, looking like oil-cloth and lasting as long or longer, and yet without that coldness to the tread which is one of the peculiar characteristics of oil-cloth. The new article was made of very finely ground particles of cork, mixed with linseed oil and other substances in mysterious ways which need not here and now be described. "Linoleum" was the name selected for it. At first it was put before the public on a very small scale. But its merits created a great demand for it, and it is now a household institution, both in this country and in England. At the head of the Linoleum business, in this country, is the well-known house of Joseph Wild & Co., of 84 Worth St., New York.

The senior partner of this firm is Joseph Wild, Esq., a resident of South Brooklyn, and one of the most hearty looking gentlemen of his age anywhere to be seen. He is considerably over seventy, with snow-white hair, erect form, and a very cheerful countenance. To look at him one would suppose he never had suffered a day's illness in his life. Yet there was a time when Mr. Wild was an invalid, worn by active attention to business, and seeming to be on the verge of total nervous prostration. Concerning his invalidity and his restoration to health one of our correspondents recently had a little conversation with him at his store.

"They tell me you were considerably run down in health, Mr. Wild?"

"It is very true, sir. I was not bed ridden, nor was I entirely laid aside from business, but I had given myself very closely to my business affairs, and my duties in connection with the church and some of the Baptist benevolent societies had weighed heavily upon me. A younger man than I might not have felt these burdens as I did, but at my time of life they began to make their mark on my constitution. I felt a lack of vitality and realized that my nerve power was about to fail me. My appetite was not as it formerly had been and my digestion was somewhat disordered. I needed, in fact, revitalization. About this time I heard of Compound Oxygen, and I made inquiry of Dr. Turner, in charge of the New York office of this remedy, to see if it could be applicable to me. Learning from him that others who had been run down as I was had been benefited by the Compound Oxygen I procured a 'Home Treatment' with considerable doubt as to whether or not it would do me any good. This was about two years ago. Since that time I have been taking Compound Oxygen, not all the time, but frequently at intervals, when I have felt the need of it."

"Then you received decided benefit from it at the outset?"

"Very soon after I began to inhale I found that I was receiving new strength. And I was glad to note that it was real strength and not a mere stimulus. I noted also the steadiness of my improvement. There was no falling back but a constant and reliable advance. Daily I could feel an increase of vitality. My spirits were better and my power of action was greater. I was able to attend to my business and to all my other duties with far less strain on me than I had for some time previously experienced."

"And so you now find yourself as well as ever, and beyond the necessity of medicine?'

"For a man of my years I am as hearty and vigorous as I can expect. I am free from disease and pain and am attending to as much detail of business as if I were only fifty years old. As to medicine, I have no use for it, drug-medicine I mean. I do not call this Oxygen exactly a medicine; certainly not in the sense that drugs are medicinal. I regard it as a wonderful vitalizer and invigorator. And it is as such that I even now occasionally resort to it when I feel the need. I keep it in the house and intend to continue doing so."

To the many gentlemen of advancing years who are over-worked and weary, and who feel themselves in need of revitalization, Compound Oxygen is, as in Mr. Wild's case, a valuable helper. The late T. S. Arthur, of Philadelphia, was brought almost from the grave by this means when he was quite an old man, and by it his life was prolonged for a number of years. The Hon. William D. Kelley, of Philadelphia, who is beyond seventy, attributes to Compound Oxygen his recovery from what had been pronounced a fatal disease. He still uses the Oxygen as a vitalizer and is in vigorous condition, attending to his legal and congressional duties as actively as of old.

For a valuable treatise on what Compound Oxygen is and what it does, write to Drs. STARKEY & PALEN, 1529 Arch Street, Philadelphia. The treatise will be mailed free of charge.

Horsford's Acid Phosphate,

Care for the Children

Children feel the debility of the changing seasons, even more than adults, and they become cross, peevish, and uncontrollable. The blood should be cleansed and the system invigorated by the use of Hood's Sarsaparilla.

"Last Spring my two children were vaccinated. Soon after, they broke all out with running sores, so dreadful I thought I should lose them. Hood's Sarsaparilla cured them completely; and they have been healthy ever since. I do feel that Hood's Sarsaparilla saved my children to me." MRS. C. L. THOMPSON, West Warren, Mass.

Purify the Blood

Hood's Sarsaparilla is characterized by three peculiarities: 1st, the combination of remedial agents; 2d, the proportion; 3d, the process of securing the active medicinal qualities. The result is a medicine of unusual strength, effecting cures hitherto unknown. Send for book containing additional evidence.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla tones up my system, purifies my blood, sharpens my appetite, and seems to make me over." J. P. THOMPSON, Register of Deeds, Lowell, Mass.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla beats all others, and is worth its weight in gold." I. BARRINGTON, 130 Bank Street, New York City.

VOL. LVII.—No. 20. WHOLE No. 2912. | NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 19, 1886. | $2.65 A YEAR IN ADVANCE No. 48 CHURCH STREET.

EDITORS: Rev. JOHN M. FERRIS, D.D. Rev. N. H. VAN ARSDALE.
ASSOCIATE EDITOR: MRS. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

DUTCH RULE.—On April 18th the Rev. Dr. De Costa, of the Church of St. John the Evangelist, without provocation, preached a sermon in which he accused the Dutch historians of having "falsified history in the interest of the first settlers of New Netherlands," and proceeded to compare Dutch and English rule to the disparagement of the former. He is answered in the New Amsterdam Gazette of April 30th. It is strange that such an accusation should come from a denomination whose infancy in this city was nourished by Dutch hospitality and whose chief corporation was endowed by the gift of a Dutch lady.

THE METHODISTS present an example just now which ought to be contagious. They fell short last year of the million of dollars proposed for missions at home and abroad. At once, undiscouraged, a fresh effort was begun to raise a million during the present year. They did not wait to take breath or repose, but promptly entered vigorously on a new campaign. The endeavor is prosecuted now with zeal and resolution. Every week churches are reporting that their apportionment or more has been collected. They evidently do not intend to leave this matter to be attended to during the last three months of the fiscal year. They are justifying the commendation once given them that "they are all at it, and always at it."

THE CONVICTION of Jaehne will gratify and strengthen all honest and patriotic men throughout the country. Justice Barrett has an excellent reputation for decisions on legal points. It is said that not one verdict of his in fifteen years has been overruled. If not strictly true the saying is certainly very nearly so. He informs the public through the reporters, who all make the same report, that, knowing the public interest in the case and realizing its great importance, he gave special attention to the points of law raised during the trial, and that since the verdict he has carefully revised his decisions and abides by them. An honest and able judge, one of the best juries selected in this city in many years, have decided that Jaehne is guilty. It was proper to withhold an expression of opinion during the trial, but now it becomes the opponents of legislative corruption to sustain this judge and jury.

THE CIRCULAR sent to many pastors of Japanese churches, urging a union in one National Church, will be found on the fourteenth page. There is no reason why the attempt should be made to transfer the peculiarities of the churches of Europe and America to the fields they occupy in pagan countries. Those peculiarities have been produced in a large degree by the special experience of those churches, by the social or political organizations under which they have been formed and by which they have been modified as the years have rolled along. Why should they be grafted upon the shoots of the vigorous Christian life in Japan? Why should not Japanese Christians be free as were our predecessors to express their belief in their own way, to organize their churches in accordance with their own social and political customs, to form a Church which shall be truly Christian and as well distinctly Japanese? Would not such a Church prove more attractive to the people of Japan than one or many fashioned after the various American and European models? Have our ways such peculiar virtues that everybody ought to adopt them? Are we to go about the world with our moulds and insisting that everybody shall be compressed in them? Let the Japanese form their Church as they will. If they make mistakes they will only do as we have done, and they will learn much from their errors as we have.

CHILDREN'S DAY.—The last General Synod did wisely to change this day from the third Sabbath of May to the second Sabbath of June. A pleasant feature of the day is the floral adornment of the churches, and the first date was found to be too early for the gathering of flowers in sufficient quantity for the purpose. Flowers are usually abundant in the month of June. Then, too, the second Sabbath of June is the time pretty generally adopted by other churches, and it is well to have a uniform day for an observance which has come to be well-nigh universal.

Children's Day has been quite recently introduced among the special days on the Church's calendar. It is growing more and more popular not only with the children themselves, but also with the parents and older people of the Church. All enter with delight into the happy services, so full of song and sweetness, and which have been found to yield not only an hour's joy, but a rich and permanent blessing.

Leaflets are now published, containing suitable exercises for the day, embracing music, responsive readings and recitations, which may be had at small cost. As to those that have come under our inspection, we are pleased to find that they are highly devotional; that the hymns are religious, not childishly sentimental; that the readings are mostly Scriptural, and the selections to be recited judiciously made. There is no reason why worship should not be as reverent and as full of spiritual blessing to old and to young on Children's Day as on any other day. Every Sabbath should be a delight, and every hour spent in the house of God one of devout gladsomeness, for it is there that we recount the rich mercies of the Lord unto us and our children.

THE MAYOR OF CHICAGO, Carter Harrison, and the gamblers, thieves and liquor dealers who have been his chief advocates, are to be held responsible for the recent communistic outbreak. Under his administration the red-flag processions through the streets have been escorted by the police, four anarchists have been members of the Common Council, an extreme communist has been made a member of the Board of Education, and the journal of the anarchists, the Arbeiter Zeitung, which has been inciting its readers to violence and the overthrow of all law, human and Divine, was appointed by the Mayor the official paper of the city for a considerable time. After the brutal outrage of last week, a policeman said, "We have had trouble before in suppressing riots, because it was understood that Mayor Harrison wanted us to fire into the air, lest we should shoot a voter." With such encouragement what wonder is it that the baser elements of the population seized upon the opportunity presented by the strikes for an exhibition of their inhuman malice.

How is it also that such a collection of the most degraded population of Europe is to be found in Chicago? It is now made public that the Hungarians who have been almost constantly riotous in the coke manufactories of Pennsylvania were imported by contractors. Did contractors bring the Bohemians and Poles, distinguished for a disregard of law in western cities and other localities, to this country? Has the greed of gain, prompting men to scour Europe for cheap laborers, inflicted this great evil upon the country? The ignorant, filthy and degraded Italians who within a few years have formed a conspicuous part of the immigration have been brought over by railroad contractors. If there is no law to put an end to this practice there ought to be one. Industrious men who come to work under the law and make homes for themselves and their families are welcome, but the habit of contractors to search out and bring hither the very dregs of the population of Europe ought not to be tolerated. How can American workingmen, or respectable workingmen from Europe, be expected to submit in silence to such a competition, forced upon them by organized capital! And, besides crowding decent men to the wall, this importation of labor is imposing upon the country a discontented, desperate multitude, without intelligence, without morality, animated by hostility to law, to property, to everything higher and better than itself. Are we to bear the burdens and atone for the crimes of European misgovernment? And, men and brethren, it is unscrupulous capital that is doing this thing. Let it be understood, we have no controversy with capital as capital. We know and rejoice in knowing that there are not a few men of wealth, engaged in manufacturing, in the management of railroads, in schemes involving the employment of hundreds of laborers, who are humane, just and generous in dealing with those they employ. They make no trouble and seldom have any. But, especially during the last twenty years, the country has been robbed and spoiled and corrupted, by a body of unscrupulous capitalists who have sacrificed everything to gain; whose success in grasping millions is one of the chief causes of the uprising of the workingmen of to-day. At this very hour the country has more to fear from the greed of unprincipled capital than from the strikes of laborers.

Mr. Bancroft as an Exegete.

THE New Princeton Review—a grievous misnomer in the opinion of many, for although the orange-colored cover bears at the top the words "61st year," yet is the present magazine in no sense a continuation of the quarterly which for so many years did such good service for morals and religion—the new review is very cleverly conducted, having in its last number a paper from Lowell, and in the current one a contribution by Bancroft, two names not to be surpassed in American literature. The latter appears in a rôle altogether new. We are accustomed to consider him as the historian of his country, and recently he issued a little monograph on a Constitutional question which is a model of lucidity and good sense.

In the present case he figures as an expositor of Scripture, and reminds us of the old proverb, Ne sutor, etc., for though he writes well and shows his customary grace of expression and allusion, his argument is a failure from beginning to end. We quite agree with his conclusion, but utterly dissent from the reasons by which he enforces it. The subject is the seventh petition of the Lord's Prayer, But deliver us from evil. In the Revised Version the last word is changed into the evil one. It is this change which Mr. Bancroft so greatly deprecates, and many join in his view, partly because it is a pity to alter so familiar a form of words, and partly because there is no gain in emphasis, "evil" being a more comprehensive term than "the evil one." The original Greek (ponērou) will bear either translation, since precisely the same form is used for the masculine gender and the neuter. Mr. Bancroft insists that it must be the latter, i. e., evil in its impersonality, and he sustains this view by appealing to other passages of Scripture.

The first one is from Luke's Gospel, where we read (6: 45), "an evil man bringeth forth that which is evil." But this is nothing to the purpose. Here the original word is clearly of the neuter gender and cannot possibly be translated otherwise than it is in both the Authorized Version and the Revision. But this fact has no weight in determining whether the word in the Lord's Prayer is used personally or impersonally. The same remark is true of Mr. Bancroft's second citation, the one taken from Romans 12: 9, "Abhor that which is evil." No one doubts that here evil in its totality is represented by the neuter adjective with the article. But this furnishes no guide in a case where the adjective may be either masculine or neuter. The third case is more pertinent. It is taken from 1 John 5: 19, "The whole world lieth in wickedness," where, however, the last word may be rendered, as the Revision gives it, "in the evil one." And certainly a plausible argument for so rendering is found in the fact that in the four other places in this Epistle in which this adjective is used with the article (2: 13, 14; 3: 12 and 5: 18), both versions concur in making it personal. In truth, Mr. Bancroft's argument limps all the way. Nobody disputes that the seventh petition may be, "Deliver us from evil," but whether it should be so rendered is another matter, and one not at all to be determined by the usage of other writers. In fact, the two instances first cited by Mr. Bancroft are the only ones in which the impersonal meaning is beyond doubt. Moreover, all the Greek fathers that expound the Pater Noster render "the evil one." So does the Syriac version and the Sahidic, as well as the three most ancient Greek liturgies (St. James, St. Mark and Adaeus), with whom agree Tertullian and Cyprian. The later Latin fathers take the neuter sense. The former view is sustained by the fact that in this same Evangelist Christ twice refers to "the evil one" (13: 19, 38), and just before the utterance of the prayer had been in conflict with the evil one as a personal tempter.

But Mr. Bancroft assigns to the Revisers a reason for their version which is alike baseless and offensive, viz., that they held the philosophy of Zoroaster, "two warring powers eternally ajar, with no decisive superiority on either side." On the contrary, they hold, as do most Protestants, that Satan is the source of all evil, as he has been from the temptation of our first parents, but that he is destined to be finally and eternally overthrown. Meanwhile we are to watch and pray against him. Dualism has no standing in the Christian Church. Again, he thinks the Revised rendering unfavorable to humility, as it implies that the suppliant has no weakness in himself and needs only to be guarded against an outside evil power. It does not appear so to us. In our view man is to offer this petition just because he is weak within, having that to which Satan can most easily appeal, and therefore he prays for deliverance. Left to himself he would soon and utterly perish.

In his concluding paragraph Mr. Bancroft claims that "the whole world of Christianity agree" in the rendering he advocates. But we have already shown that the Greek expositors with one consent hold the other view, as certainly do the most eminent of modern scholars, such as Erasmus, Beza, Maldonatus, Benzel, De Wette, Fritzsche, Olshausen, Ebrard, Keim, Hilgenfeld, Meyer, the late Holland Revision, J. A. Alexander, Sanday, Ellicott and Lightfoot.

It is very evident, then, that the eminent historian is not equally eminent in exegesis. He writes well. He understands the art of putting a case. He says very shrewd things, as when he calls the Apostle Paul, "a Calvinist of the straightest sect, if ever there was one." And he has a faculty of ingenious argumentation. But he has not the patience, the thoroughness, the tact requisite for the solid exposition of the original Scriptures. Hence, even when his conclusions are correct, the grounds upon which they rest are wrongly taken. Nor can any man, however distinguished for belles-lettres scholarship, avoid coming to grief when he pits himself on a point of exegesis against the men who have made this one thing the study of their lives.

A WISE ARTICLE in The American, of Philadelphia, on The Labor Trouble, which deserves to be quoted as a whole, contains these words: "It is not a change of method we need, but a change in the spirit which controls our industrial relations. There must be a regard for human beings as more precious than gold,—as ends in themselves, while gold is but the means, whereas we now make them the means and gain the end .... All that is needed is the purpose to touch upon no human life, however lightly, without the recognition of the common humanity and brotherhood it establishes for us. In store and office, in street and car, no human being must be treated simply as our instrument, our convenience, our tool; but a sense of a higher bond of mutual service must pervade all our intercourse. The ideal is no impossibility; it is realized already in men of the truest courtesy,—the courtesy of sincerity."

A wide interval between employers and employed has been produced by various causes. Gradually they have drifted apart, with no intention on either side of bringing about such a result. We need to summon up the belief we all cherish in the incalculable value of a man, to enable us to look upon and treat those who work for us as more precious than gold. How gold is cared for! How much more should men be cared for! The Church, too, notwithstanding its missions and schools, has been pushed out of contact with the mass of workingmen. Forty years ago they were far more at home in the Church than they are to-day. By resolute endeavor, prompted by a sense of the value of a man, the Church should put itself again in active and constant sympathy with the laboring classes. A manifestation of kindly interest goes as far with them as with other men.

OUR COUNTRY'S PERIL.

AS I tried to show last week, the peril of our country is the same which has always imperiled and wrecked democratic institutions,—the development of the socialistic spirit. The people—that is to say, the less intelligent and moral part of the people, in whom passion supplies the place of reason, and who are most easily cajoled by adroit and unprincipled demagogues—by organization are made conscious of their power, and are carried away by the notion that the country exists solely for their sakes, and that all property and all government should be administered by them. Hence their aim is more and more definitely directed to making their organization the State, and the State the only capitalist.

It is the old story of Rome and Greece, and Italy and France. There has been no such despotism in all history as that agrarian movement which culminated in the Marian dictatorship; the fierce democracies, running easily into "oligarchies," of the Grecian States; the "Councils" of Venice and Genoa; and the Reign of Terror and the Commune of Paris. We are seeing the beginnings of a similar process, the evolution of tyranny out of liberty, in our own country. Whether the final result is to be the destruction of free institutions depends upon the question whether we have—not in the institutions themselves, nor in human nature, but in something outside of and above them both—a safeguard and guarantee which makes our experiment an exception.

It is a very superficial view which finds such assurance in our system of public education. A little learning only makes the dangerous classes more dangerous, especially if it be little more than a learning to read the debasing and demagogical literature which comes within the scope of their tastes and means. I am no enemy to common schools. We must have them, or be swamped in a deluge of abject and brutal illiteracy. And if they are indeed to be common schools it is hard to see how, either in theory or in practice, a republic like ours can make them conduce to anything more than secular instruction—in other words, to adding strength and cunning to the tyrant who is awaking to a sense of power. There is nothing in our common school system which reaches the quick of this peril, namely, the lawless spirit which has no fear of God, no Christian principle of love, no submissiveness to the laws and to the powers that be as divine ordinances, no subordinating of the present by faith and hope to the divinely ordered future. The growing mass of unbelief and alienation from the Church's influence is not reached by the common school, and is but slightly touched by the Sunday-school.

I fully agree with Dr. Hodge that we are suffering ourselves to be blinded by the adversary in confining our attention to the comparatively paltry issue of reading a few verses of the Bible in our schools, when the vital question is whether the whole system itself is not on a wrong basis. Our fight, it seems to me, is not with the Roman Catholics on this matter of education, so far as their theory of the absolute necessity of a Christian education is concerned. We cannot yield to their demand that the State subsidize and support sectarian schools. But they do not exaggerate the peril of a purely secular training. They are to be honored for their sacrifices to secure religious schooling for their children by their rapidly extending parochial system. But can we afford to expose the non-catholic youth of the land to a godless training, which our Roman Catholic people shrink from? And must not the time come when we shall realize the fact that Protestantism and irreligion are not synonymous, and shall follow their example? The peril of our institutions is not from ecclesiastical quarters, so much as from atheism and materialism, from the revolt against God and the worship of man under the insidious guise of human rights and the divinity of labor, and similar watchwords of an aggressive socialistic tyranny.

We justly make a great point of "Religion in a College." The churches are girding themselves for a defensive conflict with the growing tendency to deliver over our higher education to indifference, if not agnosticism. We keep a solemn day of prayer for Colleges every year. Is this consistent with our leaving the earlier training of the young to schools which cannot, from the very nature of the case, impart any vital or fundamental religious instruction.

In the earlier stages of our history the religious element was dominant, and was able, especially in our rural districts, largely to mould the teaching of our district schools. But the enormous influx, first of Irish Romanists who opposed the slightest trace of anything but priestly religious allusion, and more recently of the infidel German, the Austrian, Hungarian, French, Italian, Bohemian, Polish and Jewish immigrants, who are still more ignorant and "foreign," and less easily assimilated, is taking the sceptre out of our hands and destroying the hope of saving our common schools from utter secularity, if not irreligion.

I would neither yield to sectarian demands, nor would I abolish the public school for those who can not be brought under religious education. But I believe that we shall be compelled to adopt the parochial system, as the Romanists have done, and as the Episcopalians are doing, and as the fathers of our Church advised. We must make our Sunday school last all the week, and sweeten and sanctify the spelling and reading and arithmetic and geography of the children with the Word of God and the winning love of Him who is the Way and the Truth and the Life. It will involve a prodigious sacrifice at first, until we can get these schools adequately endowed. But when the conscience and patriotism of the Church is fairly aroused, it will be an easy task, and will bring rich returns. I have under my eye now a parochial school of this sort, under Episcopal auspices, which is steadily drawing into the Church an increasing proportion of the families outside whom it could not otherwise have reached.

I am reminded just here, that we have in the city of New York a school of this precise character in the parochial school of the Collegiate Church, founded by our pious forefathers with a wise concern for, if not a prophetic vision of the future educational exigencies of our country. Notwithstanding the almost resistless flood of unthinking idolatry of our secular free school system, this institution has done its quiet and conservative work for more than 250 years. Its Principal reports that two out of three of its surviving pupils are consistent members of Christian churches, and not a few are in the ministry, eldership and deaconship. He says, moreover: "All my graduates are living useful, honorable lives, a credit to themselves and to the school." I myself can testify as a pastor to the good religious, as well as mental, training of this ancient and honored institution.

And he well adds: "Why should not the school be endowed, and thus perpetuated, and enlarged?" Why should we not secure, from those who would otherwise be brought up in our public schools, a constant supply of youth trained in this godly and Gospel way for the colleges and ministry of our Church? It seems to me that the lessons of the hour emphasize this appeal. And is not here the place to begin, by strengthening this stake already planted in the raging torrent of the times? Will not the Collegiate Church and our other New York churches lead the way in thus casting an anchor to windward, and providing against the evil day? F. N. ZABRISKIE.

Help One Another.

"HELP one another," the snowflakes said,
As they cuddled down in their fleecy bed:
"One of us here would not be felt,
One of us here would quickly melt;
But I'll help you, and you help me,
And then what a big white drift we'll see!"

"Help one another," the maple spray
Said to its fellow leaves one day:
"The sun would wither me here alone,
Long enough ere the day is gone;
But I'll help you, and you help me,
And then what a splendid shade there'll be!"

"Help one another," the dewdrop cried,
Seeing another drop close to its side:
"This warm south breeze would dry me away,
And I should be gone ere noon to-day;
But I'll help you, and you help me,
And we'll make a brook and run to the sea."

"Help one another," a grain of sand
Said to another grain just at hand:
"The wind may carry me over the sea,
And then, O what will become of me?
But come, my brother, give me your hand;
We'll build a mountain, and there we'll stand."
. . . . . .
And so the snowflakes grew to drifts,
The grains of sand to mountains,
The leaves became a pleasant shade,
And dewdrops fed the fountains.

Some Recollections

OF THE BATTLE OF PLATTSBURGH, AND OF THE FIGHT BETWEEN THE FLEETS OF THE AMERICAN AND BRITISH ON LAKE CHAMPLAIN, ON SEPTEMBER 11, 1814.

BY CAPTAIN WALTER BICKER.

Part II.

WE had proceeded about a mile, perhaps, upon our route, when a gentleman in a gig overtook us. A "good morning," by way of polite salutation, passed between us. And as we were in "Yankeedom," questions were in order, and the gentleman, ascertaining thereby who I was and what my business might be, said very kindly, "Now you must be considerably fatigued; don t you think you had better take a seat with me in my gig than to pursue your journey the residue of your way on horseback? I am going to Burlington; I live there and I know the Governor very well, and will take you directly to his house. A few minutes and the question was decided. So, thanking the farmer for his kindness and paying his demand for use of horse and services, I bid him good-by and took my seat with my new-made friend in his gig, which I found in a little while I had no reason to regret. My partner and myself engaged in conversation, but I soon had to give it up, as drowsiness overtook me and I fell asleep, and must have slept an hour. I apologized for it to my companion, but he politely said it was all right; he saw I was very weary, which induced him to offer me a seat in his gig. I had been up all night on this journey, and most of the night before on duty in the trenches at our camp.

Upon arriving at Burlington we unhappily found that the Governor was not there, but was at Jericho. I exclaimed with a sigh, "I am sorry for that. I do not feel as if I could go there this afternoon." My companion of gig acquaintance replied, "If you will entrust your communication for the Governor to me, I will take it to him and bring you back his reply as soon as it can be done." Without hesitation I committed the package to him and he immediately proceeded with it to the Governor.

In the evening my friend returned with a sealed note for Gen. McComb, and dropped the remark that "the Governor will take no active part in the matter. He says, 'if any of the citizens of the State choose to go they can do so; if not, I have nothing to say.'"

The next morning while canvassing the method of my return to Plattsburgh, a couple of goodly-looking men were getting ready a wagon and pair of horses. I asked them where they were going. They replied to South Hero, where they would take a boat for Cumberland Head or Plattsburgh. I begged a seat with them, saying, "I came from Plattsburgh yesterday on public business from Gen. McComb to the Governor of Vermont, and want to get back as soon as possible." They readily consented to take me with them. We were soon on our way, taking the same route that I had come by to Burlington. Nothing special occurred by the way. In crossing the bar at South Hero we found the water deep enough to overflow the bottom of the wagon. At South Hero we got a large skiff, the two men of the wagon rowing, and in due time we were at Plattsburgh. I soon made my report to Gen. McComb of the result of my embassage, and when he read the note of the Governor of Vermont, if that redoubtable patriot could have seen the smile of contempt which played around the lips of Gen. McComb, it would have brought blushes to his cheeks that might have lasted a week.

But volunteers from Vermont did come, without begging permission of their valiant (?) Governor, and something like a thousand from the "Green Mountain State" were on the ground at Plattsburgh in due time for the conflict.

Sir George Provost, Governor of Canada, had assumed command of all the royal troops in his dominions, and was concentrating ten thousand of the choicest of them in close proximity to our intrenchments. From the parapets of our redoubts we could see (with glasses) large portions of them; indeed, to the naked eye large bodies were visible. From now, the 6th, to the 11th day of the month, there were daily skirmishes between our troops and the British, several detachments being sent out by Gen. McComb to reconnoitre their position and observe their movements. This frequently brought on slight conflicts, by which both parties lost some men in killed and wounded. Our side lost two officers, one killed and one wounded, with several men. On one night a detachment under command of Major McGlassin made an assault upon a battery the British had erected on the banks of the Saranac river, somewhat commanding our position. They marched out of garrison about midnight, waded through the river, ascended the bank on the other side, seized the guns, spiked them, and returned without the loss of a single man.

For four days every hour was counted, as it was known that the British were all ready for the battle. The morning of the 11th dawned beautifully clear, with light winds from the northward; this was favorable for the British fleet to make the attack. At guard mounting (8 o clock) our whole command was paraded armed and accoutered for action. Gen. McComb, being well posted as to coming events, was on the qui vive. About 10 A.M. from our position there was a fine view over the lake and across Cumberland Head, and there was to be seen passing on the other side of Cumberland Head the upper masts and spars with the white canvas sails of the larger vessels of the British fleet, as it sailed on its way to the battlefield. Soon were seen in advance the "gallies" of the fleet, propelled by oars, passing some distance beyond the Head, and next came the commodore s ship, the "Confiance," followed immediately by the next largest vessel—a brig; then a large schooner, two or three sloops, and more gallies. The whole fleet was now in full view from our position. It had changed its course, and every vessel had its prow directed to our fleet. Every breath in camp was hushed as all looked anxiously for the first gun to be fired. The vessels of the British fleet seemed to have selected their antagonists—the "Confiance," the "Saratoga;" the British brig, McDonough s brig, the "Eagle;" the British schooner, McDonough's schooner, the "Ticonderoga," and so on. But in about the time I have been describing this the opposing vessels were near enough for operations. Instantly a flash was seen on the deck of the "Confiance," a report as of a heavy cannon was heard. A shot had been fired. Soon such smoke as is usually seen from ordnance firing, with frequent flashes of flame, were visible, while the thundering of the heavy guns in their rapid discharges from both fleets made the "welkin ring" and the land and water tremble. In about half an hour the ship "Saratoga" was seen to change her position. She had lain with her head to the North; it was now brought round to the South. This was done by means of springs upon her cables, which had been placed there before the fight began to meet just such an emergency as had occurred. This manœuvre was performed whilst the British ship and the British brig were both firing upon the "Saratoga." This ship was greatly disabled on her starboard side, which had been so much exposed to the guns of the two British vessels. It relieved the "Saratoga" from the fire of the British brig, which now gave more attention to McDonough's brig The larger vessels of the British fleet came to anchor abreast their respective opponents when the conflict began. The other vessels manœuvred as they thought best. At about this time the first British flag was hauled down. One of the sloops was rendered completely helpless and struck her flag. Not many minutes and another adopted the same course; then another, and in about an hour from the time of firing the first gun every flag was down from every mast of the British fleet. We had met the enemy and they were ours.

But the British army of 10,000 veteran troops, where were they? Echo answers, where? Not a man of them had been seen near enough to be reached by a musket ball from our position. We had our advanced guards, perhaps in pretty strong forces, out watching the enemy, but they made no movement indicative of an approach upon our works. It had been expected, from Gen. McComb down to the private soldier in our ranks, that with the commencement of the battle upon the lake would begin the assault upon our redoubts. But no! it was the most quiet day we had had in our camp for a week. We were simply waiting for our enemy to come, but they did not. In the afternoon of September 11th, 1814, the veteran troops of Waterloo, the flower of the British army, quailed, 10,000 strong, before the American army of 1,500 regular troops and some 3,000 raw militia recruits, and marched back to Canada, whence they came in great pomp threatening wonders.

When it was ascertained that the enemy were on the retreat, Gen. McComb ordered out a strong force, under Major Wool, to follow them closely to aid deserters to escape and pick up booty that might be left by the retreating foe. A great deal of military equipments, stray horses, army subsistence and minor articles were captured. It was estimated at the time that at least one thousand men were lost from that army between Plattsburgh and Canada by desertion. Arms and accoutrements were strewed along the road they took by deserters from their ranks. Our army wore black leather belts; the British, white felt belts. One of the companies of our regiment furnished itself completely with these latter by what they picked up or bought from deserters, and they were allowed to keep them. Afterward our army was supplied with such.

But where was the battle of Plattsburgh? It never was fought. There never was a battle of Plattsburgh. During the six or seven days that the British troops lay before Plattsburgh it might be called a siege; there was no fighting by large bodies of troops, there was no general hostile attack on either side. There was at no time over two or three hundred of our men engaged as one body in any fight with the enemy. The much vaunted and extolled Battle of Plattsburgh in song and oration at the time it is said to have occurred, never existed. The indomitable persistence and indefatigable exertions of Gen. McComb to make the best of things at command, deserve all praise, and he was justly brevetted for his conduct in his trying position, and I have no doubt that in the event of an assault by the enemy he would have sold his life as dear as possible, and confidently expected every officer and soldier under his command to do the same. But he was spared the dilemma, and the unaccountable conduct of the British commander in withdrawing his troops was the occasion of a merciful Providence in sparing the sacrifice of, possibly, a thousand lives. The British forces, during the five or six days they lay in front of us, were by no means idle in their attempts to annoy us, for both by day and by night, though there was nothing like a bombardment, there was a pretty frequent discharge of round shot from large cannon, and shells from mortars, and Congreve rockets that did us some little damage in our "works," but I do not know a single loss of life or serious wound to any man of our command. At night the glare from the fuse of the shells or from the rockets would attract our attention, but very few of them struck our works, most of them overreaching or falling short of us. There was either some bad engineering or some carelessness in their gunnery.

Oh, when will "wars and rumors of war cease," and brother no more contend with brother in deadly conflict for each other s life? God hasten the time when it shall be!

The Academy and Church at Orange City.

EDITOR OF INTELLIGENCER: Kindly allow me to add a word to the appeals that have already been made in behalf of the Northwestern Academy and the American Church at Orange City, Iowa. I recently made a visit there and was greatly impressed with the splendid field that has opened up to our Church in that section of the West. Orange City is a growing town, the county seat of Sioux County, and centre of a rich country, settled chiefly by our own people. A large, self-supporting Holland Church already exists there, as well as at Alton, four miles distant; and the churches of North Orange, Sioux Centre, Maurice, and other places are rapidly advancing in the same direction. The last Synodical report shows no fewer than 16 churches, with over 1,200 members, connected with the Classis of Iowa. The number is even larger now. The need of such an academy as has been established is self-evident. A good beginning has been made, and funds only are needed to build up an institution that will meet the wants of the northwestern field and form an important auxiliary to our Western College and Seminary at Holland.

Rev. Mr. De Spelder, the Principal of the Academy, is also pastor of the American Reformed Church that has been recently organized. This young and growing congregation have no permanent place of worship. They need and deserve help. Their appeal for aid should meet with a speedy response. Already another denomination is thinking of entering the place, and will surely come in if we do not occupy it in earnest. Prompt action is needed to secure and retain a foothold in these western growing towns. From want of such promptness our Church has lost too many golden opportunities in the West.

These two objects,—the Academy and English Church at Orange City,—appeal to us with special force. The field is ours, and should not be allowed to slip away from us. Said a Presbyterian minister, with whom we were remonstrating for entering fields which rightfully belonged to us: "Why, my dear brother, we cannot afford to wait for you Dutchmen. While you are getting ready to enter a place, Methodists, Baptists or Congregationalists take possession." Can this be true? Are we quite behind the times? Have we no mission in the West? We have a mission there. It is not want of opportunity nor ability that keeps us from growing, but want of consecrated energy and push. Let those brethren who say they believe in home, but not in foreign missions, show that they mean what they say by contributing liberally to our home work. Let us all be up and doing, and follow in the way where God is leading us.

J. H. WYCKOFF, of the Arcot Mission.

FOREIGN MISSIONS.

THE Woman's Board of Foreign Missions held its twelfth annual meeting on Tuesday, May 11th, at 11 A. M. Happily the managers had secured the use of the Collegiate Church, corner of 5th avenue and 48th street, instead of the lecture room in which the meetings of this Board for a few years have been held. They outgrew its capacity several years ago, and it is quite safe to say that not half the large audience gathered in the church could have found entrance into the lecture room.

The President of the Board, Mrs. Jonathan Sturges, occupied the chair, and was assisted in the conduct of the meeting by the Rev. Dr. Roderick Terry during the opening and Dr. Coe during the closing exercises.

Dr. Terry read from the 25th chapter of Matthew, verses 31–46. After singing, the Rev. E. A. Reed, D.D., offered prayer. The report of the Foreign Secretary, Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster, was read by the Rev. E. P. Terhune, D.D., of Brooklyn, and was replete with interest and beauty. The Rev. Dr. Cole, of Yonkers, then followed with the reading of the interesting and encouraging report of the Home Secretary, Mrs. J. P. Cumming. Facts and figures given in these reports showed that the work has been greatly prospered both at home and abroad, during the year. Seventeen auxiliaries were added, making 190 in all, or just ten times the number reported at the first annual meeting.

The report of the Treasurer, Mrs. Peter Donald, read by Dr. Coe, showed a prosperous financial condition. The total receipts reported for the year were $16,000.28; the payments to Synod's Board of Foreign Missions, $15,271.73.

Another hymn was then sung, and was followed by Dr. Chamberlain in a stirring and interesting address, touching first, upon the condition of women in India, and then relating some remarkable Providences in connection with the establishment of the work of female education in connection with his station at Madanapalle. He called attention to the fact that a certain Hindoo student or lawyer in this city had recently stated that the women of India were as happily circumstanced as their Western and Christian sisters, and quoted, in opposition, passages from the Institutes of Menu, the great Hindoo lawgiver, bearing upon their condition and treatment. He showed that if these principles were carried out, their condition could not fail to be one of degradation and subjection, and such he affirmed it to be.

Dr. Chamberlain's address was followed by one equally stimulating and inspiring by the Rev. A. V. V. Raymond, of Plainfield, N. J. The subject he had chosen was the importance of female influence, working along the divinely constituted lines of heredity and environment, and particularly dwelt upon the value of this factor in the transmission and development of a true missionary spirit, and the production in the Church of Christ of a truly missionary generation in the future.

Many auxiliaries, some at a distance, were represented by delegates—perhaps more largely so than ever before. There was and there could be but one voice as to the excellence and success of the meeting and the managers are to be congratulated thereupon.

HOME MISSIONS.

The third anniversary of the Woman's Executive Committee of Domestic Missions of the Reformed Church, was held Tuesday afternoon, the 11th inst., in the Collegiate Church, 5th avenue and 48th street. On account of the unavoidable absence of the President, Mrs. Van Cleef, Mrs Suydam, Vice-President P. S. N. B., took her place.

The service was opened by the usual devotional exercises, after which the report of the Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. W. W. Clark, was read by the Associate Secretary, Mrs. Edmund B. Horton. This report consisted of two parts; first, the work of the various auxiliaries, and second, reports from the field. In the former department the newly awakened interest was clearly shown by the fact that thirty-three auxiliaries have been added during the year. While the news from the far West is very encouraging and shows great cause for gratitude, yet the work has only just begun. Through the Narrows and Castle Garden hundreds of emigrants go daily toward Iowa, Minnesota and Dakota, and we must follow with our standard.

The report of the Treasurer, Mrs. U. D. Gulick, showed an encouraging increase of about $2,000 on the cash receipts of last year, while much relief has been afforded through the media of boxes and barrels of clothing, books, and various articles.

After singing, Mrs. F. E. H. Haines, of the Presbyterian Executive Committee, was introduced. She gave the ladies a warm greeting from that body and spoke of the unity existing in many respects between the two denominations. She was followed by Mrs. C. E. Walker, also of the Presbyterian Church, who gave an account, from personal experience, of the urgent need in the South and West. When we realize that the Mormons, who concede to the Bible equality with their "holy books," teach their children that the Garden of Eden was situated in Jackson Co., Mo., that Adam was buried in the same State, and that their authority is the, so-called, fact that "the Lord told Joseph Smith," can we doubt the necessity of earnest, active, speedy work in the great and wicked West?

After the doxology the meeting, which showed a decided increase in numbers over the anniversary of 1885, was dismissed, and the ladies went home, many carrying with them the intention of more earnest work in the future. E. C.

....THE PARTICULAR SYNOD OF NEW BRUNSWICK met in regular session in the Church of Lafayette, Jersey City, on Tuesday, May 4th, 1886, at 3 o'clock P.M. Rev. Thomas C. Easton, D.D., the President, was not able to be present on account of sickness. Rev. David Waters, D.D., the Vice-President, opened the Synod, and also preached the Synodical sermon in the evening. When the Synod organized Dr. Waters was elected President, Rev. Cornelius Brett, Vice-President, and Revs. J. P. Searle and Henry D. B. Mulford, Clerks pro tem. The session of the Synod was an unusually long one, lasting till late Thursday afternoon. The routine business, however, was quickly disposed of, and most of the time was taken with the trial of an appeal from the Third Reformed Church of Philadelphia, against action of the Classis of Philadelphia. The history of the case is too long and complicated to be attempted in this notice. The appeal was sustained by the adoption of the following, nem. con.:

Resolved, 1. That the action of the Classis of Philadelphia in refusing to recognize Geo. F. Gordon, Adrian Van Helden, Reuben Nichols and Jas. P. Petit as the Consistory of the Third Reformed Church of Philadelphia, and in recognizing D. S. Jones and those associated with him as the consistory of the church, which action was taken at its meeting held May 18th, 1885, be and is hereby reversed.

2. The Synod enjoins the Classis of Philadelphia to expunge from its roll the name of D. S. Jones, and to substitute therefor the name of the elder regularly accredited by the Consistory of the Third Reformed Church now worshipping at 857 North Broad street, Philadelphia.

3. The Synod also enjoins the Classis of Philadelphia hereafter to insert in the table of statistics the statistics of the Third Reformed Church.

In making this deliverance the Synod would add the following reasons:

1st. Because it is acknowledged on all sides that Geo. F. Gordon, Adrian Van Helden, Reuben Nichols and Jas. P. Petit are, in the regular line of historical succession, the Consistory of the Third Reformed Church.

2d. Because the evidence presented by the Classis of Philadelphia that "the party now worshipping in the dwelling house, 857 North Broad street, is in secession from the Third Reformed Church is, in the judgment of the Synod, utterly inconclusive.

3d. Because the position of the Classis of Philadelphia, to wit, that the said party was in secession from the Third Reformed Church, confessedly has not been reached by regular constitutional processes. But in taking this action, and not insensible of the peculiar circumstances surrounding the appellant, this Synod does not endorse or indicate the least sympathy with the personal innuendoes and direct personal charges with which the appeal and reasons thereof have been unnecessarily and wrongly encumbered.

The sessions of Synod were well attended, pleasant and harmonious, and the religious services greatly enjoyed. On Wednesday evening, Rev. E. G. Read, of Somerville, N. J., gave an exceedingly valuable and timely address on "Prevalent Forms of Sabbath Desecration, and the Best Means of Arresting the Evil." The Synod adjourned to meet next year in the Reformed Church of Lebanon, N. J. S. C.

....THE PARTICULAR SYNOD OF ALBANY met at Herkimer, N. Y., at 3 P.M., May 4th. Rev. James Demarest, Jr., D.D., was elected President. The first hour after opening and the first half hour on Wednesday were spent in devotional exercises. The Rev. Andrew J. Hageman, the retiring President, preached on Tuesday evening from 2 Cor. 4:2, "By manifestation of the truth commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God." It was a sermon eminently adapted to the occasion, and gave much satisfaction. On Wednesday afternoon the communion of the Lord's Supper was celebrated, and in the evening Rev. Denis Wortman, D.D, preached from the last clause of the 13th chapter of 1st Corinthians, "The Divine Love," entering fully into the discussion of a point of great interest.

The devotional services were well sustained and their influence felt in all the work of Synod.

The Rev. Alex. R. Thompson, D.D., spoke very earnestly for the Board of Foreign Missions, and Synod renewed its expressions of interest in and its determination to prosecute the work.

The reports from the Classes are generally encouraging; some of the churches having enjoyed an unusual degree of spiritual prosperity.

The church at Herkimer gave Synod a royal greeting, a very pleasant feature being dinner and tea served in the chapel, thus affording opportunity for more social enjoyment.

Synod meets next year at Schoharie.

...NORTH AND SOUTHAMPTON, PA.—This church at the May communion welcomed eight new members—six on confession of faith. The Crystal Anniversary of her Ladies' Auxiliary Society was largely attended. Fifteen District Collectors reported 110 givers with $107. A sociable was held after the entertainment, which netted the Society $25.70 for the pressing needs of the Foreign Board. COM.

The North Church, Brooklyn, N. Y.

IT was with the greatest reluctance that the North Reformed Church of Brooklyn made its general appeal for aid in its financial difficulties. The consistory decided to take this step because it was unwilling to neglect any measure that might give promise of saving the church, and because in the event of the sale of its property it desires to be free from all reproaches in the matter.

It has been suggested that my recent article omitted to state clearly what has been done. By concessions from the holder of the second mortgage; a loan of $1,000 from the Collegiate Church of New York, for five years without interest, and the gifts of friends, we have secured $6,000. We need $4,000, less $500 which the church can pay.

It is expected that the special circular to ministers will secure about $1,000. If this expectation is realized there still remains $2,500 to be provided. The consistory is willing to give the Board of Domestic Missions a mortgage on its property, without interest, to secure to the denomination the money thus advanced by sister churches, provided the amount reaches $3,500, and thus insures the success of the plan.

Unless this plan does succeed, and that by June 1st, the consistory cannot now see how it will be justified in longer continuing the attempt to keep the church alive. If successful in this, we become at once self-supporting. The time is short! Brethren, what shall we do? Address

....PASTORS' ASSOCIATION, N. Y., May 17th, 1886.—In the absence of the Rev. Dr. Easton, who was to have read on "Evangelistic Work," the Rev. Dr. Chambers read an interesting and exhaustive paper in exegesis of 1 Cor. 15: 29, (Baptism for the Dead), which verse he declared inexplicable. The Rev. W. W. Knox held the view of a baptism with reference to faith in the dead but risen Christ; the President, that of a baptism on account of the faith and constancy of the deceased Christians. Interesting reminiscences of the Baur controversy followed, and the Association rejoiced over tidings of Dr. Van Cleef's improved condition. Next Monday Dr. J. M. Dickson, of New York, will read a paper on "Prohibition of the Liquor Traffic."

...SOUTH CHURCH, BROOKLYN, N. Y.—The forty fifth anniversary of this church was celebrated on May 16th by appropriate services.

At the morning service, which was led by the pastor, Rev. A. DeW. Mason, prayer was offered by Rev. H. V. S. Myers, D.D., of Newburgh, the fourth pastor of the Church, and the sermon was preached from Psalm 137: 5, 6, by Rev. Prof. Samuel M. Woodbridge, D D., the first pastor, thus engaging in the one service the three pastors who are still living out of the five who have served the Church since her organization.

At the afternoon service an historical sketch was read by the pastor, and addresses delivered by Rev. Prof. Woodbridge and Rev. Dr. Myers, to which the Rev. U. D. Gulick, of the Twelfth Street Church, and Rev. A. H. Brush, of New Utrecht, added the congratulations of their respective congregations. The presence and participation in the service of Rev. Dr. West, Secretary of the Board of Domestic Missions, and Rev. Wm. H. Ford, of the Middle Church, greatly contributed to the enjoyment of the exercises. The fineness of the weather, rendered doubly acceptable by its contrast with the storms of the previous week, the bright floral decorations and joyous music rendered by the choir, in which Mrs. May Cauldwell and Mrs. Thomas sustained the principal parts, were of marked assistance to the pleasure of the occasion, while the presence of large numbers of present and former friends of the church from all parts of the city gave the entire celebration the happy tone of a family reunion which was very delightful.

....JERUSALEM, N. Y.—The installation of Rev. John Scarlet as pastor of the Reformed church took place on the 12th inst. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Chapman, of the First Church of Albany, after which Rev. Mr. Craig, of Coeymans, delivered the charge to the pastor, and Rev. Mr. Pearse the charge to the people. The services were interesting throughout. The church was tastefully decorated and a large congregation was in attendance.

Rev. Mr. Scarlet succeeds the Rev. Mr. Vedder in this pastorate, and begins his labors under very favorable circumstances. Mr. Scarlet was graduated from the Theological Seminary in New Brunswick in 1882, and took charge of a Presbyterian church in the Presbytery of New Brunswick immediately after his graduation.

After the installation a sumptuous dinner was furnished by the ladies of the congregation, and upwards of 125 guests sat down at the tables. PARTICIPANT.

....THE REV. PAUL D. VAN CLEEF, D.D., gained strength all last week; the improvement in his condition during a few days past has been marked and encouraging.

....THE CORNER-STONE of the Martha Memorial Church, on 52d street, between 9th and 10th avenues, in this city, will be laid next Sabbath afternoon, May 23d, at 2 o'clock, with appropriate services in English and German.

....GALLATIN, N. Y.—The ladies of the Reformed Church have met together and organized a Ladies' Missionary Society auxiliary to the Woman's Executive Committee of Domestic Missions. The zeal and earnestness manifested at this first meeting fills us with the hope that this organization will awaken and deepen missionary interest in the church and community. M

....CURRYTOWN, N. Y., rejoices over a handsome new church edifice, great improvements in the church grounds and parsonage, a growing congregation, an earnest prayer-meeting, and a manifest interest in everything pertaining to spiritual good. A recent effort made for the Board of Foreign Missions resulted in a contribution of $55 from the churches of Currytown and Maple town. Rev. G. Wyckoff is to be installed as pastor of these churches on May 25th.

C.

....TARRYTOWN, N. Y.—The Rev. John A. Todd, D.D., for thirty-one years the pastor of the Second Church, has resigned his charge.

....REV. FRANCIS S. REDERUS, pastor of the Third Church of Pella, Iowa, died at Pella on May 8th, in his 66th year.

He was born in the province of Groningen, Netherlands, graduated with honor in 1856 from the Theological School of Kampen, and served five congregations in his native land. He came to the United States in 1872, was the pastor successively of two eastern churches, and in 1877 removed to Pella, where he has served the Third Church for nine years. His death was the result of a cold taken at a funeral during the severe weather of last winter.

....WESTERN ITEMS.—The Classis of Iowa has organized a church at Prinsburg, Minn....J. T. Anderson has been appointed Professor of Greek and Latin Literature at Hope College, Holland, Mich....The Council of Hope College, in their annual report, state the number of students to be 175; there have been added to the library 99 volumes; the Permanent Endowment Fund has been increased $4,700. The current expenses were defrayed by receipts amounting to $11,512.40. Balance in the Treasury, $138.58. The real estate belonging to the College, not including the grounds, is valued at $16,000. A musical entertainment was given in connection with the Commencement exercises ...The Fifth Church has been organized in Grand Rapids, Mich. The members have already contributed $2,000 toward a church building....The Rev. W. Wormser has accepted a call from Jamestown, Mich.

....ESOPUS, N. Y.—A call from the Reformed Church has been accepted by Rev. J. Howard Van Doren, of Gallupville, N. Y. He expects to enter upon his ministry there in June.

....NOTICE.—A number of items of Church news are held for next week for lack of space to print them.

A Modern Sir Galahad.

BY MARY R. BALDWIN.

CHAPTER VII.

"Who shall expound—ah! who but God alone,
The everlasting mystery of love?"

TOM HYR felt that he must leave Danton at once, for he knew that each time that he looked into the face of the "floweret" he should be subject to a great temptation to tell his story in human words. He had told it in spiritual language, as perhaps it never might be told again by him; he felt that it had been understood, but he had that craving for a human sign which he decided made it unsafe for him to remain in sight of the pale, sweet face and the pleading eyes, if he would hold to his purpose to give the maiden an opportunity to choose her lance from the many, for Tom had no doubt that even in Boston courtly and worthy ones would hasten to bow at such loveliness and purity.

Before his departure he went alone out to the spot where the revelation had come to him through the lifted face; he wanted to be sure that it had not all been a dream. Mrs. Marshall watched him as he went out of the yard and turned into the highway, and said to Anise, "That city young man seems to be walking on air. I talked with him about sending you away to school, and I must say that for a young man he has pretty good judgment."

A painful blush overspread the girl's face, which fortunately the mother did not observe, she longed to ask just what Mr. Hyr had said, but she could not. Her mother went on to say that she had decided to send her to Cousin Martha's in Boston as soon as she could get her ready, for she felt sure that Martha, having no children of her own to look after, and having urged her to send her Anise, would be rejoiced at such an arrangement.

Tom had reached the very spot of love's illumination. He, too, as Sir Galahad had done on the morning of his ordination, stood with uncovered head, as if on consecrated ground and in the presence of sacred influences. If the first philosopher of Tom's time had told him that mental as well as spiritual conditions had been subject to a renewal, that henceforth he must live through this renewal upon a higher plane, perhaps he would not have understood it, and would have insisted that the change affected only the seat of the affections; nevertheless, it was true that having crucified the lower man in the recognition of love, he went forth a new man. At parting, he looked earnestly into the eyes of the "floweret," and a larger hope was born from the vow made to honor. As Laurence Bowles took the hand of his friend in parting at the station, he said, "I thank you for your well-meant advice, but you do not understand my leadings. I must follow on as duty directs, even though it be through the fiery furnace of trial. But I wanted to say to you that I shall go to Shoreton very soon, and I hope to be blessed in owning a wife, Tom."

Tom could only grasp his friend's hand more tightly; he could not answer a word; his heart was too full. But as he entered the car and took his seat, he was filled with pity for the man whose lover's vision had not been able to comprehend those things which it must be unlawful to utter.

The preparations for the departure of Anise for Boston were nearly completed, when one day after Laurence Bowles had finished reading to her, he laid down his book and said: "Miss Anise, I think this is our last hour of reading together for a long time. I shall go to Shoreton in a few days, and when I return you will not be here. I need not say that I shall miss you, but I shall be happy to know that you are improving your mind and thus following out your father's wishes, and fitting yourself for your part in life's great work. The Lord help you and help me to do our work well."

The words of the minister had the ring of a charge as of a benediction to the young girl; she felt too deeply touched at the thought of parting from one who had been so much to her in a life otherwise lonely. She could have laid her head upon the breast as if it had been her father's and poured out her grief, but she only lifted her eyes to those of the minister and said, "Mr. Bowles, I can never thank you enough for all you have done for me. If I only could help you in some way I should be glad."

"You have helped me," he answered; "you may have a chance to help me still more—who can tell?"

Anise went to the sitting-room to find her mother alone, who asked, "Has Mr. Bowles told you that he was going to exchange with the minister at Shoreton?" "Yes, mother, he told me that he was going to Shoreton very soon, and when he returned he would find me gone, and that this afternoon's reading was probably our last," the daughter answered.

The mother laid down her work and said, "Come to my room, dear child, and tell me all about it."

Anise was not surprised at her mother's manner; since the going to Boston had been decided upon the mother's heart had been softening toward her child,—the child whose gifts and graces had so surprised her—and whose intense, yearning nature had often exasperated her, simply because she could not understand it.

"Sit here on this stool. Do you remember that you often sat here by your father, and that you told him everything that was on your mind? Tell your mother now, dear, only once, tell her all! What did the minister say to you beside what you have told?"

"I have told you all he said, mother, except about our separate life-work."

"Did he say nothing about—about—your finishing your studies—nor about meeting you when you came home—nor—"

Anise raised her head, looked into her mother's eyes, and there saw a peculiar expression. She did not question with regard to it; she blushed deeply while she said, "Mother, I've been thinking the minister needs a wife; I hope he may find one worthy of him soon, but he will never marry a Danton girl, I am sure of that, and I am glad to think he will not."

Mrs. Marshall heard her daughter's words with astonishment. She had watched the companionship closely and she had believed that one or both were subject to love with reference to it. Anise had certainly changed wonderfully since the minister had come; and day by day since she had noticed her worship for the minister she had been haunted by the thought, "Oh, if it should turn out that she loves him, and he does not love her!" Much as her mother heart would have rejoiced at the idea of a marriage of her child with the minister, she was in a sense relieved at the discovery that the heart of Anise had remained untouched, and her motherly pride began to imagine a future for her child which would be a worthy outcome of the Boston project.

Laurence Bowles packed his valise carefully with the linen so well preserved by the care of his Aunt Beatrice, and started for Shoreton. He had been gone but one hour when a letter arrived for him from that town, a letter dictated by the "ogress," and calling him to her side, as her life was fast failing.

At Danton when the Sunday had passed, and the talk of the "supply" had given place to that concerning the going and the return of the regular minister, the town was startled at the news of the departure of Anise Marshall for Boston. Many were the speculations with regard to the project, and Mrs. Holdridge considered the subject worthy of a tea gathering.

"It really does seem," she began, as the little company were gathered in the parlor, "that there must be a connection in some way between the going of the minister and of Anise Marshall. Mrs. Marshall says she wants to give her daughter a chance for higher cultivation. Only think of such words from Maria Marshall! whose family knew nothing about education, and as for cultivation, they hardly knew what the word meant."

"The minister's very words, you may be sure," remarked one of the company; "he uses the word 'cultivation' very often, you know."

"Well, it seems to me that something is going to happen in our church that will give it a kind of overturning. We shall see what we shall see." With this sage remark the ladies rose, as Jerusha announced tea, and went out to get new inspiration over their cups. Jerusha, alone in the company, found no inspiration and no cheer from this gathering, for she had heard that very day that Hiram Pritchard's home was visited by sickness, that one of his children was very low with the scarlet fever, and that with a bed-ridden wife things were as hard as they could be. It was not openly talked of at the tea gathering, but she heard whispers here and there concerning his fresh troubles.

"You see, its being scarlet fever, nobody wants to go and take care of the child."

Jerusha's face paled and her cheeks flamed, and if Hiram Pritchard could have seen her then and have thought himself free as of old to pronounce upon her face, he might well have said that she was beautiful, for there is nothing that can transform a face as the stirring of its owner's soul toward high sacrificial purposes.

Laurence Bowles arrived at Shoreton at midnight. The next morning, as he was taking breakfast at the hotel where he had stopped, he heard a remark which surprised him.

"Yes, I suppose it is true that the old lady Eaton has only a short time to live. That poor young creature who has been kept caged so long may have a chance to breathe outside air once in awhile."

"She knows nothing of the world," remarked another; "any rascal falling in love with her might easily dupe her, making her believe he was perfection."

"No, no!" remarked the first speaker. "I will trust to Miriam Eaton's instincts to discover the rascal; though a man may possibly win her who will make her life miserable. She is a delicate creature, and rare china needs more careful handling than rough wares."

Laurence Bowles drank his coffee hastily and started for the old mansion. An old family domestic answered the call of the knocker and led the way to the old fashioned parlor, from whose walls hung the portraits of the Eatons of days that were passed. Soon the door opened, and he drew his eyes from the stiff figures in the frames to fasten them upon the face of Miriam Eaton as she came to meet him. An irresistible force made him spring forward and take the hand of the maiden in both of his. The womanly soul saw not the knight of Danton's church; she saw simply her knight, with all the wealth of his manly soul offering itself to her virgin heart, and without knowing anything of the process she gave this heart in its loveliness into his keeping.

Laurence Bowles for one brief moment forgot the relation of his errand to Danton church—forgot all but the woman before him—and love was love and nothing more; had rightful claims, was sufficient unto itself.

"We must go to grandmother," Miriam said; "she has been so impatient for your coming since we sent that letter."

"A letter! I received no letter!" Laurence replied.

She turned love-illumined eyes upon him as she said, "Then you come of your free will?"

"Of my free will, my love, to ask your life." And her woman's faith saw her life transformed.

Quietly the two entered the sick chamber; propped in an invalid's chair the "ogress," watching the door, set her eyes upon the man and the maiden as they entered; there was no sign in the expression upon her face that told of surrender to the death forces that were closing in upon her life. Nothing but the extreme pallor told of the awful fact.

She beckoned to the two to come near; she whispered, "You got my letter?"

Laurence answered, "No. I came to tell your grandchild of my love."

She caught at the words eagerly, and said, "Then you want to marry her! Go, Janet! call the minister, it must take place at once." Janet, in obedience to her life-long habit of unquestioning service, was gone.

The astonished minister and his deacon, with a worthy squire, soon arrived, and Laurence Bowles and Miriam Eaton, beside the dying woman, stood to take upon them the marriage vows.

The ceremony was as if it had not been to the two whose souls had no need of it, for the breathing of the dying woman grew more and more labored, while a look of peace from the soul was reflected upon the face. At the last word of the minister's prayer Miriam laid her hand upon the forehead grown clammy with death's chill; she kissed the cold forehead. The firm mouth whose muscles had for years been tightening relaxed gradually; the breathing became fainter, and the bridegroom and his bride together faced death.

A funeral following a wedding in a home is not after the established order of things, and if such an event occurs, it seems to the world as if Providence had interfered with life's proprieties in an inexcusable manner.

On the third day after the strong spirit of the old lady who had so long reigned a queen in the mansion of her fathers had gone forth, at the twilight of a cold winter's day, the newly-made husband and wife were sitting together before the fire in silent, separate wonder if it were really true that henceforth their lives belonged to each other. Janet, the housekeeper, coming in with the lights, at last broke in upon the reverie. The poor, faithful creature could hardly see for the tears that welled up into her eyes; eyes that for long years of service had looked to the eyes of her mistress to know her will. She had not, it is true, always found those eyes sympathetic, nor always even kind, but they belonged to her mistress, and this was sufficient to her loyal thought. She glanced furtively at the married pair as she entered. Her sweet nursling had gone to the keeping of another. Somehow the wooing and the wedding, aside from its connection with the funeral gloom, was contrary to her idea of such an experience for the dear girl, and she could not make the bridegroom seem at all equal to the bride. She had a decided prejudice against a man's marrying on to an estate, as she proudly called the Eaton property. She would rather have chosen that the one who should marry Miriam should come like a prince from afar, bringing his gifts. She had known her mistress' desire with regard to this man who had saved her life; she was witness to the scene in the chamber of death; and she had gathered that the marriage would not have taken place then, if ever, if her mistress had not with her dying voice ordered it.

But it was the parting with her young mistress which she felt was to be her great trial, for it had been decided that she should remain and keep the old house until the next summer, when the minister was to bring his wife for the vacation. All had been arranged at last, and Laurence Bowles and his bride were on their way to his field of labor. Janet had watched the carriage out of sight, then with one long sob she cried to the empty rooms of the house: "Poor lamb! She's gone out not knowing whither!" Janet's Bible and hymn-book were unfailing sources of comfort to her. She took the worn Testament from her capacious pocket, read a portion of the fourteenth chapter of John, then opening her hymn-book, sang,

"My God, my father, while I stray
Far from my home on life's rough way,
Oh, teach me from my heart to say,
Thy will be done! Thy will be done!"

Inspiration of the Hebrew Vowel-Points.

BY GEORGE S. BISHOP, D.D.

Part I. The Argument.

THE bearing of the inspiration of the Hebrew Vowel-points is upon inspiration itself; for if the points be not inspired then the words are not, and then the sentences are not, and then the Book itself is not, and room is left for the Rationalist to assert that "the Bible is not God's Word but only contains it."

Her fundamental position—that from which the Church can never be moved—is laid down by St. Paul when he says: "All Scripture—every sacred writing—is given by inspiration of God"—"words which the Holy Ghost teacheth"—the words. The manuscript is theopneustic, not the man.—The two tables on Sinai were writ by the finger of God. Not less directly and precisely—on the original parchment—was every word, line, mark, point, penstroke, jot, tittle put there by God. The parchment decays, but the writing is indestructible. The plaster on the Babylonian palace may crumble, but "Mene! Mene! Tekel! Upharsin!" remain. That is the Church's position and that position compels and always has compelled the inspiration of the Hebrew Vowel-points down to the Seghol and the Sheva,—for

I. The vowels are the life of a language. The consonants are not. The consonants are simply stops upon the breath; but the breath—Ah, E, O—Ye-Ho-Vah—is primal, the soul.

No language can be without vowels. As says the Kabbalah, the oldest and most eminent Jewish authority, "Consonants are the body and the Vowel-points the soul; the consonants move with the motion and stand still with the resting of the Vowel-points, just as an army moves after its sovereign." "Vowels," says Dr. Gill, "are the life and soul of language. Letters without them are indeed dead letters; the consonants, stubborn, immovable things; they cannot even be pronounced without vowels, which are, as Plato says, their necessary bond." That, therefore, the Hebrew, the first and most perfect language of all, God's own peculiar language, should be without them is inconceivable.

II. The Vowels are absolutely necessary for reading and teaching a language. What one might do with briefs—a skeleton—after he has mastered a language is one thing, but what a beginner can do, is another. "A tongue," says Dr. Lightfoot, "cannot be learned at first without vowels, although at last, skill and practice might make it to be read without them." "Points in Hebrew," says Chappelow, "are like scaffolds in building—when the work is done we may take them down and throw them aside, but not sooner." "It was," says Dr. Gill, "the duty and interest of every Hebrew to read his Bible, that being the charter of his salvation—a charter not written for learned men only, but for the common people—men, women and children who could not read without points."

The above testimonies I myself have confirmed by conversations with the Jews, who all assert the same thing, that to teach their children the language, they are obliged to use the points.

III. The Character and Genius of the Hebrew language makes the Vowel-points indispensable. Without them it would not be possible, in many cases, to tell nouns from verbs; nor nouns from each other, nor what verbs were passive, nor what active—nor ever to arrive at the exact, unmistakable meaning.

An example of this in the Hebrew is the word שָׁעַר "to esteem;" this by change of the Vowels becomes שַׁעַר "a gate"—שָׁעַר "a porter"—שָׁעַר "to shudder"—שַׂעַר "vile"—שֵׂעָר "the hair"—שַׂעַר "fear, horror, a whirlwind"—and שְׂעֹרִים, in the plural, "barley." All eight words to be distinguished only by the written points.

As an illustration in English take the word, Word itself—W. R. D. "Word," "ward," an apartment; "warred," made war; "wearied," "weird," "worried."

Take away the Vowel-points from the complete paradigm of the regular verb in the Hebrew and what have we left? The multitude of mood, tense and personal endings are at once swept away. Instead of that easy masterfulness in the arrangement and shifting of thought; instead of that copiousness, fulness and vigor of diction; instead of that tactful and versatile touch of expression which have been regarded as the product of its seven different conjugations, we have but two or three varieties—a language meagre—robbed not only of its flesh, but of the articulations of its very bones—poor beyond poverty—angular, bungling and inelastic.

IV. It is not easy to make it consistent with the love and the kindness of God that He should give a revelation, touching such an affair as salvation, in ambiguous words which admit of various senses, and which, at the best, give a difficult sense,—difficult even for men of the profoundest learning and greatest quickness to arrive at; and which, like lying Delphic Oracles, may be taken in a sense just opposite to that intended. "He who reads the Scriptures without points," says Junius, quoted by Owen, "is like a man who rides a horse, 'αχάλινος, without a bridle; he may be carried whither he knows not."

V. The unequivocal testimony of Christ to the points. "Not one jot, (Yohd,) and not one tittle, (κεραια, horned accent,) shall pass away." These words of Christ, "jot," "tittle," are no plagiarism from some common proverb, and no tautology. They mean, in all Divine intention and emphasis, just what they say. And to confirm it, let me cite the celebrated John Piscator, who remarks in treating on this passage: "It appears from this that the Holy Bible in the time of Christ was written with the points, and that they were approved by our Saviour."

VI. The marginal rabbinical notes, the so-called Keri Ve-kethib. The Keri in the margin does not correct vowels to consonants, but the reverse. The consonants change, the vowels STAND, both in the Kethib and Keri.

VII. Touch the Vowel-points, and you touch the whole inspiration of Scripture. "Words which the Holy Ghost teacheth." "Words," not half words—not wind-swept skeletons to be filled in by human thought. Consonants are not words, and if men can make vowels, they can also make consonants, and therefore make a Bible.

Nor is the minuteness of the Vowel-point against the argument, since God, who can make a gnat, an animalcule, can equally make a Kibbuts or a Sheva.

VIII. Without the Vowel-points we cannot support the infallibility of God's Word. There are plenty of passages where, without the Vowel-points, no man alive can tell the meaning of the Holy Ghost, nor know what is the mind of God. Take, for example, זְבַר, זֶבֶר in Isa. 26: 14

Rome opposes with all her most virulent force the inspiration of the Vowel-points, because once rid of them, she makes the Church the arbiter, the interpreter. The Church puts in the points.

Protestantism stands for the points, and because she is forced to substitute for an Infallible Church an Infallible Something—a Bible!

IX. The constant uniform tradition of the Jews as to the inspiration of the Vowel-points, which extended down to the year 1538, twenty one years after Luther nailed up his Theses. The Points were then denied by Elias Levita, a rationalistic Jew. "It is to the Massoreth Ha Massoreth of Levita," as Dr. Ginsburg admits, "that we owe the present modern controversy concerning the antiquity and inspiration of the Points." Levita stood one against his whole nation at the time of writing his book. Buxtorf, in his Tractatus de Punctorum, puts this with great force.

X. If the Vowel-points were not always in the Great Temple MSS., when were they introduced? Such a change as the pointing over of the Bible from Genesis to Malachi would have produced among Christians as well as the Jews, little less than an earthquake.

Press the argument further. The Points are in existence. Not only do we have books written and printed without them, but we have the books WITH them,—of which these short-hand copies are briefs. Where did the points come from which are to-day upon the MSS. considered as authority? Those which regulate criticism and are the unswerving conservators of the true text—those points, where did they come from?

Press the argument still further. It is said that the points were invented by the Massorites because we get them last from the Massorites, but the question still echoes, where did they get them?

XI. Either the Hebrew Points were before the Massorites, or the Massorites before the Points. If the Massorites made the Points, why did they leave so many words anomalous and pointed against the rule of the language? If the Massorites did not make the Points, but were afraid to touch them even where they might have done so, then the Points rule long before the Massorites as Buxtorf mightily maintained.

XII. If the Points were not original, but put in afterward by the Massorites, why did these same Massorites,—in the face of their own teaching that Isa. 53 means actively what Christ shall inflict upon others, and not passively what He shall suffer from others,—why did they leave Isa. 53 pointed still for the Cross and dead against their own teaching?

XIII. De Rossi's argument. The command in Deut. 27: 8 to write very plainly and intelligibly בַּאֵר הֵיטֵב unquestionably premises that the Law was written with vowel signs, else it would not have been very plain and intelligible.

XIV. We argue from the absurdity. Take away the points for an interval of 500 years and no man could, from the naked consonants, make out the Hebrew. As say the Jews, justly, "No man can lift up his tongue to read without punctuation." And again, (Cosri pars Tertia: 28), Si rationi relinquatur dominium super haec, mutabit illa mox omnes libros, primo in literis, tum in dictionibus, denique in omnibus. "If the control of the vowels were left to our reason, soon all the books would be changed—first in the letters, then in the words, and lastly in every particular."

XV. The history of Calvinistic orthodoxy is bound up with the Vowel-points, i. e., an infallible Bible.

This is so true that all the great names—the Buxtorfs, Turrettin, Heidegger, Voetius, Leusden, Van der Hooght, Schultens, Piscator, John Owen, Lightfoot, Dr. Gill, and the whole conservative phalanx agree on the points.

The last Doctrinal Confession of the Reformed Church of Switzerland, the Formula Consensus of 1675, drawn up by Heidegger and Turrettin, and which fitly closes the period of the great Calvinistic confessions, says as follows:

"In particular, do we accept the Hebrew Codex of the Old Testament which comes to us from the hands of the Jewish Church to which were formerly committed the 'Oracles of God;' and we firmly maintain it, not only as to the consonants, but also as to the vowels, sive ipsa puncta, the very points; the words as well as the things, as θεοπνευστος—God-breathed—part of our faith not only, but our very life."

A GREAT AWAKENING.—Mr. Labaree, of Oroomiah, Persia, writing at the close of January last, reports a remarkable spiritual awakening in all parts of their mission field, beginning with the Week of Prayer. The revival extends to several villages. Many lukewarm Christians were greatly revived, and sinners of all grades, young and old, have been converted. Places of worship have been found too small to accommodate the crowds. At the time Mr. Labaree wrote the work was still progressing and spreading to other places. The names of several towns are given where there are from twenty to forty, and even sixty, inquirers. In other villages it is said the work is equally deep, but only general reports have been received.

....“THEISM AND EVOLUTION: An Examination of Modern Speculative Theories as Related to Theistic Conceptions of the Universe.” By Jos. S. Van Dyke, D.D. With an Introduction by Dr. A. A. Hodge. This is much the best book that Dr. Van Dyke has yet issued. It is written in an easy style and a very good spirit, and after a very thorough study of the subject. The author admits the facts of evolution so far as made out, but shows that it is impossible by any hypothesis of this kind to explain the origin of matter or force, man's rational nature, or his conscience, or his will. Some scientists say that no man should discuss these points save one who is an adept in physics, but we demur. It is not the evolutionist's facts that divines criticize, but his inferences from those facts. Speculative theories are justly subjected to the examination of every fair reasoner. (A. C. Armstrong & Son.)

....“SENT BACK BY THE ANGELS, AND OTHER BALLADS,” by Frederick Langbridge, is a daring attempt to put in the form of the modern street ballad “the short and simple annals of the poor.” He has fully adopted the lingo of the London streets, and seems to have projected his mind and heart into the scenes and experiences of the lowest English types, so that it is not to be wondered at that his ballads have been so remarkably successful with that class. They are likewise well worth the study of all who would not only know how these people talk, but what are their simple joys and sorrows, and the romance and sentiment by which their rude lot and lives are lighted up. The ballads are full of those touches of nature, which make all the world akin. Read from the proper standpoint, as voicing the inarticulate thought and experience of these people, the ballads strike us as something wonderful. (Cassell & Co.)

....“BUGLE ECHOES: A Collection of Poems of the Civil War, Northern and Southern.” Edited by Francis F. Browne. The story of the War is being re-told in these days, and its battles fought over again. Why should not its songs be sung once more? Yet this volume is by no means a collection of mere war songs, good, bad or indifferent. It is, rather, a selection from the vast mass of songs and poems to which the war times gave birth, of those which are worthiest to live and be remembered. The selection seems to have been judiciously made, and with impartial as well as critical eye and hand. The best known war lyrics of Bryant, Longfellow, Lowell, Whittier, Stedman and Whitman are here, with others that are worthy of a place beside them for their own poetic as well as martial and patriotic fire.

Both sides in the great struggle are about equally represented—“The Battle Hymn of the Republic,” and “My Maryland,” “The Stripes and the Stars,” and “Dixie.” Yet this should be no objection to the book, but rather constitutes one of its merits. So much is due to the truth of history, and since re union and peace the poems of both sides are the common heritage. And it is well worthy of notice that in many of the poems, which express pure patriotic sentiment or warlike feeling and enthusiasm, it is difficult to determine whether the poet's sympathies were enlisted for “the blue” or “the gray.” In some cases, were the author's name not given, it would be impossible.

The publishers have done their part well as regards form, paper, type and binding. (White, Stokes & Allen.)

....“PERSIA: THE LAND OF THE IMAMS,” is “a narrative of travel and residence” in the years 1871–1885, by James Bassett, a missionary of the Presbyterian Board. Its peculiar value is in not being a made-up book, but in telling what the writer has seen and learned for himself in his extended tours and long residence. At the same time, he gives a valuable bibliography, which shows that he has not been remiss in acquainting himself with what others have written. The title, “Land of the Imams,” indicates the point of view in which his observations have been made of Persia, as everywhere reflecting the special sect of Moslemism, known as that of the “Twelve Imams,” a sort of “apostolical succession” theory. Mr. Bassett writes clearly and intelligently, and one can learn a good deal of history, travel and geography, besides important religious information, from his book. (Harpers.)

....“THE COUNTRY BANKER,” by George Rae, with an American Preface by Brayton Ives, gives at once an intelligible account of the principles and methods of the banking system, and wise and practical suggestions to the managers and clients of our banks. While imparting important information, and dealing with matters pertaining to only a class, he has done his work with so much literary skill that the interest of the reader is never permitted to flag. (Charles Scribner's Sons.)

....“MORGAN'S HORROR,” by George Manville Fenn; “OLD FULKERSON'S CLERK,” by Mrs. J. H. Walworth; “NATASQUA,” by Mrs. Rebecca Harding Davis. (Cassell's Rainbow Series.) The pronounced literary character of the “Rainbow Series” must be at once conceded, if these volumes are to be taken as fair samples. The stories are all of a decidedly sensational order, but in other respects are unobjectionable and are certainly told in a very vigorous way. Although they are not pleasant narratives, they are nevertheless exceedingly fascinating and will, no doubt, be eagerly welcomed by those who are fond of light fiction. “Morgan's Horror,” a tale of the West of England and of the exploits of a wrecker, is full of picturesque descriptions, of incidents related with dramatic power, and of strong sketches of character; “Old Fulkerson's Clerk” narrates the career of a defaulter, and traces in an entertaining way the history of the victims of his crime; and “Natasqua,” a love story with a sad ending, although much simpler in plan than the other stories, is equal to them in interest. (Cassell & Co.)

....“THOUGHTS FOR THOUGHT.” By William Frederick Faber. This bright, cheerful and compact little book of about two hundred pages, in seven discourses presents the following themes: The Relations of Church and State; The Coming Church; The Work of the Nation, and The Education of the Young. The author has hope and faith in the life and vigor of the Church and of the nation. The Church is not a religious club, nor is the nation a mere gathering of human beings. “The Church,” says the author, “is the body of Christ and the visible expression of the invisible Spirit,” and the nation a “symbol of humanity in fellowship.” The style of the book is lucid and forcible, its spirit candid and courteous, and its tendency is to awaken profitable thought on the great themes so ably discussed on its pages. (Alfred E. Rose, Westfield, N. Y.)

....“HOPE REED'S UPPER WINDOWS,” by Howe Benning, is one of those quiet, restful stories which easily hold the attention, and while they do not obtrude striking qualities, stimulate thought and excite to right action. The motto of the book might fitly be given in the words found near the close of the narrative,—“the highest blessing is to learn to do His will.” (American Tract Society.)

....“A HISTORY OF MODERN EUROPE.” By Richard Lodge. A remarkable book. A thorough disappointment, but a very agreeable one. The volume is small. One takes it up with the expectation of finding in it a severe condensation, necessarily rather dry; a skeleton of dry bones. He finds, to his great enjoyment, the exact contrary. The period treated reaches from the capture of Constantinople by the Turks in 1543 to the Berlin Treaty of 1878. It includes the Reformation, the Thirty Years' War, the conflict with the Turks, the decline of the Venetian oligarchy, the annals of the Dutch Republic, the reign of Louis XIV. of France, the victories of Marlborough, the naval conflicts between England and the Netherlands, the French Revolution, the Consulate and Napoleonic empire, the wars of Frederick the Great, a period crowded with important events, with fruitful movements on which volumes have been written. All this is rapidly surveyed, and a vivid, graphic picture of the succession of events and of the men engaged in them, portrayed. There are 752 closely printed pages. The author finds place for brief biographical sketches—that of Luther is admirable. The characteristics of leading men and women are set down impressively in a few words. Space is given to philosophic deductions, such as this: “All real vigorous reform must proceed from within. A humanist reform, imposed by the culture of the outside world, could have had none of that deep moral feeling which characterized the influence of Luther.” The book is really a wonderful achievement and is very engaging. As a book of reference it is of very high value. It is one of the “Students' Series.” The Index is excellent. (Harper & Bros.)

....The Old Testament Student for May gives some pages to a symposium on Bible Study in Theological Seminaries, in which such ministers as Rev. Drs. H. M. Dexter, Heber Newton, C. E. Robinson, Wm. M. Taylor, Bishop Fallows, H. L. Wayland, take part with others. Prof. M. S. Terry argues in favor of a limited creation to reconcile geology and Genesis—unnecessarily we think. Prof. Schodde contends that the Book of Kings is trustworthy history and not what some modern criticism would make it.

....Men of various opinions appear in The Forum. C. T. Congdon looks hopefully on The Experiment of Popular Government, concluding with a blow at the Senate which will be commended and condemned. W. A. Croffut and L. F. Post consider the question everybody is asking, What Rights Have Laborers? President Barnard's delightful account of How I was Educated is the most pleasing article in the number, and many will listen with respect to Lieut. Greely's opinions in relation to The Future of Arctic Exploration. Mr. Edward Cary answers the question, Would We Do It Again? by assuring all concerned that the Republicans who voted for Mr. Cleveland are ready to repeat their action. However much we disagree with him it is worth while to know what Moncure D Conway thinks of Contemporary Supernaturalism, and as a matter of course Mr. James Parton writes an interesting paper on Victor Hugo as a Citizen.

....The Prize Essay, by Rev. Sereno Bishop, of Honolulu, on the Red Sunsets of over a year ago, published in the current number of The Sidereal Messenger, is pleasantly written and conclusive. The portion dealing with the mighty power of the eruption of Krakotoa gives a notable illustration of the forces at work on and in the earth. The editor writes instructively and acceptably on the Comets Fabry and Barnard, and the ephemeris of each for the month will be found in the Editorial Notes, with much other matter profitable to observers. Mr. Corrigan, of the Nautical Office, Washington, writes very suggestively on The Principal Comet Meteor Streams, and Mr. Brashear, of Pittsburgh, contributes lucid instructions on Working Rock Salt Surfaces for Optical Purposes. Miss Clerke's History of Astronomy and Mr. Gore's valuable Catalogue of Suspected Variable Stars receive well-deserved praise. We are reading Miss Clerke's book with a great deal of enjoyment.

....The May Century compares favorably with previous numbers in literary and artistic excellence. The illustrated articles are “American Country Dwellings,” by Mrs. Schuyler van Rensselaer; “The Flour Mills of Minneapolis,” by Eugene V. Smalley; “A Californian's Gift to Science: Lick Observatory,” by Taliesin Evans; and “The Breeding of Fancy Pigeons,” by E. S. Starr. The war articles possess absorbing interest, which are “From the Peninsula to Antietam,” by Gen. George B. McClellan; “The Battle of South Mountain,” by Gen. D. H. Hill; and another chapter of Mr. Goss's “Recollections of a Private” on McClellan at the head of the Grand Army. The Rev. T. T. Munger writes suggestively of “Evolution and the Faith.” A paper on “Hawthorne's Philosophy,” accompanied with portraits of the novelist, is furnished by his son, Julian Hawthorne. Timely editorials and Open Letters, and a jolly Bric á-brac close one of the best numbers of the Century yet issued.

Mr. Abbey's poems exhibit originality, culture and imagination.—[New York Tribune.

The quaint meter and rhyme frequently employed and the wierd tales related, lend a peculiar charm to the volume.—[The Chautauquan.

It is sobriety of judgment verging sometimes on sadness that finds expression in Mr. Abbey's pages. —[Herald, Brighton, England.

His individuality of style sets even common themes in a new atmosphere.—[Queries Magazine.

Mr. Abbey's delightful poems are worthy of a place in any library.—[St. Paul Globe.

Mr. Abbey approaches Wordsworth in a certain beautiful directness and simplicity in his best moments.—[Boston Advertiser.

Many of the ideas advanced in the poems are new and clothed in exquisite language.—[Denver ews.

The popularity of Mr. Abbey's poems has steadily increased and widened until to-day its author's name is a household word.—[St. Louis Republican.

Mr. Abbey has several stories to tel.—one or two of them stories of the old slave time—and he tells them well.—[London Academy.

Mr. Abbey possesses a fine poetic mind, susceptible to the spirit of things, and his poems are one more outpost of the ideal world in America.—[Literary Life.

AUNT MARJORIE'S CORNER

The Coming of His Feet.

IN the crimson of the morning, in the whiteness of the noon,
In the amber glory of the day's retreat,
In the midnight, robed in darkness, or the gleaming of the moon,
I listen for the coming of His feet.

I have heard His weary footsteps on the sands of Galilee,
On the temple's marble pavement, on the street,
Worn with weight of sorrow, faltering up the slopes of Calvary,
The sorrow of the coming of His feet.

Down the minster-aisles of splendor, from betwixt the cherubim,
Through the wondering throng, with motion strong and fleet,
Sounds His victor tread, approaching with a music far and dim—
The music of the coming of His feet.

Sandaled not with shoon of silver, girdled not with woven gold,
Weighted not with shimmering gems and odors sweet,
But white-winged and shod with glory in the Tabor-light of old—
The glory of the coming of His feet.

He is coming, O my spirit! with His everlasting peace,
With His blessedness immortal and complete.
He is coming, O my spirit! and His coming brings release.
I listen for the coming of His feet.

Helpful Words.

SEVERAL friends have written of fugitive poetry which has been helpful to them, since the publication a fortnight ago of a little talk on the subject. Some of the most popular collections of verse, such as "The Changed Cross," "The Shadow of the Rock," and "The Uplands of God," are composed wholly of floating waifs, rescued from the newspapers and bound in charming little books, just the convenient size and shape for holding in the hand. Many a little gem laid away in the scrap-book or between the pages of the Bible is a talisman to the heart that treasures it. After all, what fame can be half so precious as the knowledge that one has been able to say a helpful word to some of the struggling and despondent, or tired and tempted souls about one?

The Woman's Boards.

THEY met for the first time this year in the beautiful Forty-eighth Street Church, the chapel having been so overcrowded last year as to have been uncomfortable. It was a sight full of cheer, all those bright, interested faces, some older, some younger, all animated and responsive, while reports were read, hymns sung, and addresses made. Both the Foreign and Domestic meetings were marked by a genuine enthusiasm, and one felt that the home piety would be of a higher type, the individual tone spiritually would be finer, because of this work for the Master in which these women had found so much pleasure.

Now, dear friends, that the annual meetings are over, shall we suffer their influence to evaporate in mere talk? Summer is coming, to many of us a practically lost part of our year because meetings are suspended and we do not take up our usual collections. Suppose we resolve that this summer, even if in some places no meeting of our society is held, we shall put aside our weekly offerings regularly, and regularly have our hour of prayer and of missionary reading. Some of us may like to send letters to our missionaries, not asking replies, but just assuring them of our remembrance. Let us work faithfully in the year we have begun, doing the more for our Lord that we know the time is short.

Life Everlasting.

A DEAR mother lay dying. For years past that hoary head had been the crowning glory of home. In all the affairs of family life her advice had been deemed precious, for had she not sought the wisdom that cometh down from above, and the confidence reposed in her judgment was but the evidence of the guiding hand. Through the trying period of young maternity, as through the riper years of motherhood, and when at length others now matured had assumed the burders it had been hers to carry, and age had silvered the locks and diminished the physical vitality, her trust in the dear Redeemer had deepened and strengthened until with the apostle, in cheerful assurance, she could say, "I know whom I have believed." Never had she appeared more beautiful than while awaiting the summons to come up higher. Her children to the fourth generation had gathered around the bedside. The tenderness and love shown there were but the ripened fruit of her own planting in the years gone by. Grandmother was loved because mother had first been the all in all. As the last words were spoken to each in turn in the realization that the parting would be for a little while only, one surprised at such calmness in the very face of the King of Terrors, exclaimed: "Why, this is not like death!" "Death," said the departing saint, as a new light appeared to gleam in the dying eyes and a momentary strength was imparted, "death, why this is life everlasting!" In a few moments the spirit had returned to God who gave it. The reality of the Christian hope, the comfort of a childlike trust in Him who has promised us all things, both for this life and that to come!

"Jesus, Thou Prince of Life,
Thy chosen cannot die;
Like Thee they conquer in the strife,
To reign with Thee on high!"

IRENE.

"Had Light in Their Dwellings."

BY MRS. E. M. DAVIS-GRANT.

HAD light in their dwellings; aye, yes,
For He who is light was their God.
The darkness that e'en might be felt,
Was used in this case as a rod.

Sometimes we are left in the dark;
Bewildered, we stumble and grope;
Wonder why other dwellings have light
While we are bereft e'en of hope.

But not like dark Egypt's proud king,
For we know every stroke comes in love;
Though the darkness is dense, yet we know
Through the clouds shines our Saviour above.

Then send, Father, send weal or woe,
Send darkness if darkness we need
To draw us close, closer to Thee,
Only be Thou our soul's light, we plead.

Prayer.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.

WHEN you have prayed, does not your heart feel lighter, your soul more content?

Prayer renders affliction less grievous, makes joy more pure. It gives to the one fortitude; to the other a celestial perfume.

What are you doing in the world? And have you nothing to ask of Him who has placed you here?

You are a traveller who seeks His country. Do not walk with head bowed down? Raise your eyes heavenward that you may see the way.

Heaven is your home; and when you look above, do you return no thanks?

Have you no petition to make, or do you ever remain mute?

It has been said, "Of what good is prayer? God is too high above us to listen to such worthless creatures!"

And who, then, has made these worthless creatures? Who has given them feeling, thought and speech, if not God? And if He has been so good toward them, was it to forsake them afterward, and repulse them far from Him?

Truly, he who says this in his heart, that God despises His works, he blasphemes God.

Others have said: "Of what good is prayer? Does not God know better than we of what things we have need?" Yes! God knows better than we of our necessities, for God is Himself our own first need. And prayer to God is the beginning of love in our hearts.

The father knows the needs of his child. For that reason should the son never return, by word or action, gratitude to his kind parent? When animals suffer, are in fear, or hunger, they utter pitiful cries.

These are the prayers which they address to God, and He bows down a listening ear.

Should man, then, alone of all creation, be the only being whose voice never reaches the ear of his Creator? Over the plains sometimes passes a violent hot wind, and the withered branches of the shrubs and flowers bend to the earth; but moistened by the dew they regain their freshness and raise their drooping heads.

So there are burning winds which pass over the soul to wither it. Prayer is the dew which refreshes the sad and weary spirit.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.

By Way of Encouragement.

SO much obliged for the dressmaking hints in April 28th.

Soap bark for renewing black had been often recommended, but nobody seemed to be informed as to the modus operandi. The encyclopædia gave no help, only the exciting information that soap bark was "an article of commercial value used in cleansing and renewing woollen goods."

Provided with the package we were as much at a loss as the Occidental with his first drawing of tea, and whether to roast, to boil or to fry it was a question.

However, here was the soap bark and here was the cashmere. Something must be done. Why not use it like soap? So putting both in a pail of warm water we rubbed vigorously and wrung out the cloth. But alas! the hard bark fibres adhered closely, refusing to be removed from the material, which looked worse than before.

Your one suggestion as to straining the decoction would have saved all this trouble.

The next experiment was with bran water, but nobody said anything about boiling the bran, and this was equally unsuccessful.

The knowledge of "just how" to go to work is half the battle, and this is what your clear, concise article gives us. Thank you very heartily for it.

The Fashion of Sealing a Letter.

WE are told that this dainty fashion is on the wane, that it is in a fair way to be relegated to the past again. It is certainly more elegant to seal a letter than simply to paste it together with mucilage, albeit the latter may be as real a defense against the prying curiosity of the outside world as the former. In fact, so far as honorable people are involved, no letter requires a seal, since the moment a letter is addressed to a person it becomes that person's property, sacred from the inquisition of every eye but his. Yet, except when a letter is delivered by a private messenger, it is proper to fasten it securely, and the recipient finds peculiar pleasure in opening his own letter.

A favorite author says, apropos the subject: "In the matter of sealing, for example, a question of ceremony and courtesy is involved. The time that it costs to take a proper impression of a seal shows the absence of hurry and the disposition to sacrifice, which are a part of all noble courtesy."

There were certain beautiful associations with the art of sealing. There was the taper that had to be lighted, and that had its own little candlestick of chased or gilded silver or delicately painted porcelain; there was the polished and graven stone of the seal, itself more or less precious, and enhanced in value by an art of high antiquity and noble associations, and this graven signet-stone was set in massive gold. The act of sealing was deliberate, to secure a fair impression, and as the wax caught flame and melted it disengaged a delicate perfume.

Another Word for the Birds.

AUNT MARJORIE begged the girls a few weeks ago to abandon the cruel fashion of wearing birds or their wings as ornaments.

Now she appeals not to girls, but to those who are older. A white dove, stuffed and mounted, is an emblem of purity and peace, but does it not seem to you barbarous that thousands of the pretty gentle creatures should annually be sacrificed to add beauty to funereal decorations? The dove is sent with the floral emblems and is prized the more that it remains when the flowers have faded. Yet it is a cruel custom which sends mourning to the nest when the home nest has been rifled of a treasure.

....."A RANCHMAN'S STORIES." By Howard Seely. The ten short stories which are brought together in this neat volume are deserving of notice not only because they furnish very bright and readable sketches with which to while away a leisure hour, but also because—although independent of each other—when taken together, they afford a very satisfactory view of frontier life, and especially of that of a Texan ranch. The stories are diversified in subject and character, ranging from the humorous to the pathetic, from the sentimental to the severely practical, but all are told with a captivating vivacity and a realistic power which easily win and hold the interested attention of the reader. (Dodd, Mead & Co.)

...."DANGER SIGNALS. The Enemies of Youth. From the Business Man's Standpoint." By Rev. F. E. Clark, Pastor of the Phillips Church, Boston. A collection of Sunday evening lectures delivered to hundreds of young people, founded largely upon the statements of Boston merchants, in response to a circular letter of the preacher concerning the temptations and perils of boys and young men in that city. Mr. Clark has made good use of the information thus obtained, and in these nine pointed and interesting discourses he deals closely with prevailing evils and with the understanding and consciences of his hearers and readers. We very heartily commend the book for wide circulation and careful thought. (Lee & Shepard.)

CHILDREN'S PORTFOLIO.

The Century Plant.

(TO A CHILD.)

In my garden grows a plant
  Very stiff and very stately,
And its curving leaves I grant
  That my eyes admire greatly.

But though I may watch and wait
  All the years that God shall send me,
Watch it early, 'tend it late,
  Not a bloom that plant shall lend me.

Once within a hundred years
  Doth it burst to blossom only,
And forgotten will be tears,
  And no more shall I be lonely.

All delight in earthly bloom
  Will be less than nothing to me,
When those splendid flowers perfume
  All the walks and haunts that knew me.

So I find my love is more
  For the rose that blossoms yearly,
Than for all the hidden store
  That this stately plant holds dearly.

Better is it, child, to show
  Daily love and tender sweetness,
Than to hide in deeps below
  All that gives your life completeness.

Better far to fill the air
  With a common, fragrant pleasure,
Than to stand aloof and rare
  With an unseen glowing treasure.

Bloom to-day, and if the frost
  Shall to-morrow nip your beauty,
Then you will not, dear, have lost
  All that lies in active duty.

Yet, if God commands you, wait
  With a splendor in you growing,
Stand with meekness in your state
  Till the bud is ripe for blowing.

—James Berry Bensel, in May Wide Awake.

A King's Son.

BY ELA THOMAS.

A Sketch in Two Parts.

PART I.

In 1594 a little boy of six months was christened with due ceremony at Edinburgh, Scotland, Henry Frederick. He was the first child and heir of King James, of Scotland, and his wife Anne. A royal boy at that time knew very little of the liberty and pleasures of childhood. When the child was five years old we find him given over to a tutor, while a number of lords and gentlemen made up his body of attendants. He was scarcely six years old when his father wrote a book of "instructions to his dearest son, Henry the Prince." This was divided into three parts—his duty toward God, his duty when he should be king, and how to behave in things which are only right or wrong as they are rightly or wrongly used. Before he is seven years old we find Henry Frederick writing a formal letter in French to the States-General of Holland. On his ninth birthday he wrote a letter to his father in Latin, in which he gave a list of the Latin books he had read—a list that I fancy would astonish some of our small school boys who now and then complain that they have to study so hard. Nor was his training only in books. When he was seven years old he began learning to "ride, sing, dance, leap, shoot with the bow and gun, toss the pike," and to engage in all the exercises in which it was considered proper that a young prince should be accomplished. Withal he was so brave and gentle, so affectionate and obedient that he won the love of all about him.

When Prince Henry was nine years old, by the death of Queen Elizabeth, his father became King of England as well as Scotland, and the young prince the heir apparent to one of the most important thrones in Europe. On this sudden change in his fortunes, his father, who could write most excellent precepts, if he did not always practise them, wrote his son a letter warning him that the new honors about to fall to him would chiefly be in cares and heavy burdens. "Be," he says, "therefore merry, but not insolent; resolute but not wilful; keep your kindness, but in honorable sort."

On his arrival in England, Prince Henry, as heir to the crown, was given a separate establishment with a hundred and forty-one servants; quite a household, we would think, for one little boy. Here for a time his sister Elizabeth, two years younger, lived with him, and very happy they must have been together. This pleasant arrangement, however, did not last long, for it was the custom of that day for royal children to be placed in charge of suitable persons of rank, so poor Princess Elizabeth was separated from her brother, and the two who loved each other so dearly had to be content with letters.

The young prince seems to have been fond of letter-writing, for when he is ten years old we find him corresponding in Latin with the Doge of Venice, the Landgrave of Hesse, the Prince of Poland, and his grandfather, the King of Denmark, and a little later in French with the famous King of France, Henry Fourth. These rulers recognized in him not only a clever, high-minded boy, but one who, if he lived, would from his position exert a powerful influence in Europe. A warm friendship also existed between the Prince and the young Dauphin of France, Henry sending the latter a pack of little dogs. The Dauphin, learning through the French Ambassador that Prince Henry was fond of horses, and a bold and accomplished rider, acknowledged the present by a suit of armor and two fine horses.

At twelve years of age Henry was said to be studious, fond of all manly exercise, never idle, good-natured to his dependents, preferring the society of those older than himself. It seemed as though already he felt that childish pleasures were not for one who was striving to fit himself for the government of a great kingdom, and who, though so young, was already respected and feared by those having the management of public affairs. He was a fine, brave boy, careless of fear and danger; not always agreeing with the opinions of his parents, yet obedient and dutiful to them, although his mother was openly partial to his younger brother Charles, and his father was jealous of the boy that he felt the people loved better than himself.

The Better Way.

Libby made a hat for her doll out of the peel of half a lemon left over from Maggie's cooking.

She took out all the inside, cut two slits in it, one on each side, through which she was going to put a tiny blue ribbon which dolly had worn for a sash, carrying the ribbon straight over the top; and, to make it complete, she would ornament it with a little feather out of the duster.

So, with her mind full of the picture of a yellow hat with blue strings and gorgeous crimson plume, she laid the lemon-peel on the window-sill and went upstairs for the ribbon.

Alas for the wonderful hat!

Dear old grandpa came in and sat down by that very window, and seeing the lemon-peel there, (how should he know it was a hat?), took it up and nibbled it a little, just enough to spoil it.

He did not relish the taste of it, however, and tossed it over to the woodbox, and then leaned his head against the high back of his easy-chair for a comfortable rest.

Just then Libby came in with the doll and ribbon.

"Did you see my doll's hat on the window-sill, grandpa?"

"No, dear, there was no hat here."

"Then Maggie has taken it," said Libby; "I wish she would let my things alone."

"And it's no hat that I see on the window at all," said Maggie stoutly, "nothing but a bit av liminpale that the ould gentleman threw to the woodbox."

Libby soon discovered grandpa's innocent mischief, and feeling greatly injured, especially as Maggie laughed and grandpa almost smiled when she explained matters to them, was turning away with flushed cheeks and pouting lips to carry the story of her griefs to poor sick mamma upstairs, when a good thought came to her.

It was her morning verse, "Be ye kind, tenderhearted, forgiving one another;" and she turned and looked at grandpa, who was saying he was really sorry, and, besides, it "had left a bad taste in his mouth," and all of a sudden it flashed into her mind what a dear, good grandpa he was, and she ran to him and kissed him.

"Isn't that a better taste in your mouth, grandpa?"

"Yes, indeed, my dear."

Libby had a happy heart the rest of the day.

It is always a better way to kiss and forgive than to pout and be angry. Try it.—Child's Paper.

Fishes.

It is not an easy thing to study the every-day life of fishes. Living as they do in the water, and keeping out of sight, our only hope of observing them is from an occasional glimpse, which gives little opportunity to learn their habits and peculiarities. Preserved specimens are not of much help; they serve, however, to remind us that much of the charm of fishes lies in the grace of their movements, and in the peculiar lustre which plays upon their sides as they glide through the water, but which is soon lost after death.

Fishes are well adapted to swimming. Their shape is such as to move with the least possible friction, and they are further aided by the smooth, slimy coating, which generally consists of scales overlapping each other like tiles on a roof.

Dr. Hartwig says of fishes: "We wisely endeavor to imitate this peculiar form in the construction of our ships, yet the rapidity with which the fastest clipper cleaves the waters is nothing to the velocity of an animal formed to reside in that element. The flight of an arrow is not more rapid than the darting of a tunny, a salmon, or a gilt-head through the water. Every part of the body seems exerted in this despatch; the fins, the tail, and the motion of the whole backbone assist progression; and it is to this admirable flexibility of body, which mocks the efforts of art, that fishes owe the astonishing rapidity of their movements."

On examining the backbone of a fish you will find it to consist of circular vertebræ, which are concave at each end. The space between the vertebræ is filled with a jelly-like substance, giving great freedom of motion. The ribs are not much curved, and are attached to the spinal column at one end.

The fins are chiefly used to balance the fish in an upright position, while the principal swimming organ is the tail, which is set vertically at the end of the spine, so as to work from side to side.

As the weight of the body is greater than that of the surrounding water, most fishes are supplied with a "swim-bladder," which connects with the œsophagus, and which, being filled with air, assists the fish to rise or sink in the water.

Fishes' gills are leaf-like bodies lying in cavities on each side of the neck, and covered by plates called gill-covers; they may often be seen gently moving when a fish is in its native element. You may also notice the gills in fishes that have been arranged on a string for convenience in carrying; in such cases it is customary to put the string through the "gill-slit."

The breathing of fishes we shall find to be a very simple process. All the air they require is contained in the water, which enters freely at the mouth, passes over the gills, and escapes at the gill slit. The blood, continually circulating through the gills, absorbs oxygen from the water, and becomes purified. This breathing from water resembles the act of swallowing, with the important difference that the water passes to the gills, and not to the stomach.

We sometimes say, when a fish is taken out of the river, that it dies for want of water. Strictly speaking, it would be more correct to say that it dies for want of air. Surrounded as it is by air, the fish can make no use of it because it is not mixed with water, and the poor creature flounces and throws itself uneasily about as it slowly suffocates.—Harper's Young People.

The Societies.

THE AMERICAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION held its sixty-second annual meeting on Sunday evening, May 9th, at the Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. Prayer was offered by Rev. D. N. Vandeveer, D.D. Addresses were made by Drs. T. L. Cuyler, R. S. MacArthur, and ex-Justice of the U. S. Supreme Court William Strong. The Secretary, Dr. J. M. Crowell, gave the following statistics showing the work of the year ending March 1st, 1886: Schools organized, 1,618; teachers in them, 7,086; scholars in them, 60,121; schools (not before reported) aided, 1,681; teachers in them, 16, 669; scholars in them, 148,527; schools (previously reported) aided, 3,291; teachers in them, 17,097; scholars in them, 161,572; Bibles distributed, 6,516; Testaments distributed, 8,593; family visits, 29,660; addresses delivered, 9,022.

....THE AMERICAN SEAMEN'S FRIEND SOCIETY held its fifty-eighth anniversary on Monday, May 10th, at the Home, No. 190 Cherry street, New York. Reuben W. Ropes was elected President. The Treasurer's report showed that the receipts were $88,243.08, and the expenses $38,380.58. The Society last year sent out 574 loan libraries, 11,334 volumes sent from the rooms in this city, and 8,512 from Boston. More than 1,700 sailors were accommodated during the year. Addresses were made by several clergymen.

....THE NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY AND PUBLICATION HOUSE celebrated its twenty first anniversary on Tuesday night, May 11th, in the Broadway Tabernacle, which was crowded. Senator Alfred H. Colquitt spoke of the successes of local prohibition in Georgia, and Rev. C. H. Mead gave an account of his missionary tour through the South. Gen. Clinton B. Fisk also made an address. The Secretary reported that the year had been the most remarkable in the history of the Society. More than 40,000 letters and postal cards were received last year, and 30,000 letters and postal cards and over 25,000 packages of literature were mailed to different parts of the country. The Society has now 900 different temperance tracts on its catalogue which circulated during the year to the extent of 90,000,000 pages. More than $100,000 has been spent by the Society in copyrights and literary labor, and more than 250 well known writers have been employed. The missionary work has been directed to sending missionaries to the freedmen in the South; to the work in Congress for a National Commission on the results of the liquor traffic; to conferences, mass meetings and Sunday services in the interests of temperance work; to the introduction of temperance text-books in the schools, and to spreading temperance literature among prisoners, hospitals, shops and needy localities. The receipts of the year's publications were $52,953, and with receipts from other sources the total amount reached $63,513; the expenses for the year were $63,550. The Rev. Dr. Cuyler was elected President for the ensuing year.

....THE AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY held its sixty-first annual meeting at the Madison Square Presbyterian Church lecture room on Wednesday forenoon, May 12th, to hear and consider the annual report, and for addresses, resolutions, and election of officers, Hon. Wm. Strong, LL.D., President, in the chair. The officers elected by the Society were the same as last year, except that Samuel S. Sloan was chosen on the Distributing Committee in the place of Gamaliel G. Smith, deceased; and that Rev. A. D. F. Behrends, D.D., and Hon. Hooper C. Van Vorst were chosen Directors. As Honorary Vice-Presidents, Right Rev. Henry C. Potter, D.D., Rev. E. D. G. Prime, D.D., Rev. Truman M. Post, D.D., and James Coats, were appointed in place of Rev. Drs. S. H. Tyng and S. Irenæus Prime, and of Messrs. Samuel Small and Wm. J. King.

The receipts for the year were $339,356.16, of which $98,893.76 were donations and legacies. The home grants for the same time amounted to $34,773 90; the grants to foreign missions, $8,300. Expended in colportage and colporteur agencies and depositories, $54,203.98. The mortgage on the Society's premises was reduced $15,000. Thirty volumes and 52 other publications were added to the Society's list of home issues, and 19 to those published at foreign mission stations. The home press printed 183,800 volumes, and over five millions of tracts, card-packages and wall-rolls; also more than three and a half million copies of its periodicals, seven in number.

Among the addresses were strong appeals by Dr. Hopper, of China, to enlarge the work of the Society in that field; by Dr. Armitage and Rev. Mr. Rainsford, of this city, in behalf of appropriate tracts for the emigrants; by Colporteur Farrar, a successful laborer among the needy but hopeful blacks in the southern sea-board States; by Dr. Jones, of Staten Island, in behalf of seamen.

Resolutions were unanimously passed for the appointment by the President of a committee to inquire into the operations of the Society and suggest any changes which might increase its usefulness. Also others commending its issues as applying the principles of the Gospel to all classes as the Divine remedy for the popular unrest and the great perils of the day; and urging Christians of all denominations to a greater use of an instrumentality so largely blessed in the past.

Rev. Dr. E. B. Coe preached the annual sermon to a large audience last Sabbath evening in the Collegiate Church, on 5th avenue and 48th street.

....THE AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY held its seventieth annual meeting Thursday, May 13th, at the Bible House. Enoch L. Fancher presided. The Rev. Joseph D. Wickham, D.D., of Manchester, Vt., who was present when the Society was organized, gave an account of the event and some pleasant reminiscences of prominent clergymen then in attendance.

The annual report showed that the receipts for the year had been $523,910, a decrease from 1885 of $64,003. Of this amount $232,124 was received from the sale of books, $38,381 from grants and foreign agencies, $132,488 from legacies, $58,220 from gifts, $32,412 from rentals, $10,162 from interest, and $12,445 from income of trust funds. The expenses for manufacturing and all other general purposes were $499,998, leaving a balance of $23,911. The Board has already pledged $178,658 for next year's foreign work. There has been a great deal of activity in the matter of translation and revision. Portions of the Old Testament are to be printed at Honolulu for the Gilbert Islanders. Mrs. Robertson's version of the New Testament in Muskogee will soon appear. Rijutei's translation of Luke into Corean and Dr. Macdonald's version of the Proverbs in Siamese are ready for the press. Some portions of the Old Testament have been put into the Shanghai Colloquial and the New Testament into the Canton Colloquial. An easy Wenli version of one of the Gospels has also been authorized. The Old Testament will appear in modern Syriac this year, and many parts of it in Spanish and Portuguese. Two hundred and seven volumes in raised letters for the blind have been printed, making a total in forty years of 14,184. Some Books have also been put in "point print" for those who can read in that way. The total number of copies of the Scriptures of all sorts published during 1885-1886 has been 1,274,036. In the United States 3,829,225 families have been visited, and 335,021 families and 194,369 individuals have been supplied with Bibles. Three hundred and eighty-five agents and colporteurs have been employed abroad and 206 at home. The expenses of the Society in foreign work were $137,357.

THE OLDEST WOMAN IN INDIANA.—A letter about Mrs. Mary Beneman, in the Western Christian Advocate, from her pastor at Russiaville, Indiana, says that her one hundred and seventeenth birthday was celebrated by the citizens of the town on April 27th, that she is the daughter of Captain C. R. Perry of the Revolutionary Army, was born in Delaware on April 27th, 1769, moved to near Circleville, Ohio, with her husband and two sons in 1808, moved to Indiana in 1853, is the mother of eight children, four of whom are living, has been a member of the Methodist Church nearly eighty years, spends her waking hours at present in sewing and reading, and can see as well as ever to thread her needle.

TUESDAY, 18th.

THE value of silver has been declining rapidly, until it has become lower than before known. The silver in a legal-tender dollar to-day is worth a trifle over 75 cents. That is, the silver in a Bland dollar costs the Government less than 75 1-2 cents, and is paid out to the people at 100 cents. It was claimed that the silver bill would keep up the value of the metal. It has not had that effect, and we are farther from a safe bimetalism than we were five years ago. The American farmer can be paid in silver certificates for what he has to sell, and the exporter sells it for gold in Europe. Yet the producing West is the centre of the silver craze. Some anxiety is felt in regard to the future in view of the fall in silver.

A partial report by the Bureau of Statistics shows exports of grain, flour and meal during April to the amount of $11,959,853, against $14,051,554 in 1885 and $12,251,178 in 1884. The decline is due in part to the fall in prices Cotton exports are valued at $15,212,889, against $9,443,703 in 1885. Provisions, lard, tallow, butter and cheese were valued at $6,530,396, against $7,166,048 in April, 1885, and $5,263,584 in 1884. The export of petroleum amounted to $3,532,371, against $3,520,214 in April of last year. Cattle and hogs exported were worth $882,063, against $1,362,947 in April a year ago. The total values of the articles named for April is $38,117,572, against $35,544,465 for April, 1885. The increased export of cotton continues. The export of merchandise at this port last week amounted to $5,893,162, and the import to $8,091,102. The export of specie was to the extent of $691,155, and is checked for the present. Sterling exchange sold yesterday at $4.86 1-2 for sixty-day bills and $4.89 for demand.

The Associated Banks of this city and vicinity reported last week a decrease of $3,325,000 in loans, of $1,114,300 in specie, of $4,102,600 in deposits, and an increase of $1,114,300 in legal tenders. The surplus of reserve was increased $1,383,550, and raised to $12,497,075. Money loaned on call yesterday at 1 1 2 to 2 per cent.

The foreign grain markets are reported steady and the demand fair. The season is from ten days to a fortnight late in Great Britain. The growing crop here is in a fine condition. Quotations for June grain yesterday were: Wheat here 87 7-8, in Chicago 75 7-8; corn here 47, in Chicago 36 1-4; oats here 35 3 8, in Chicago 28 1 4. The demand for hay and straw is good and prices are steady. Choice timothy is worth 90 to 95 cents and long rye straw 97 1 2 cents to $1. The closing bids for cotton yesterday were: May 9 6, June 9.7, July 9.17, August 9.26, September 9.10, October 8 97.

The Stock Market is awaiting results. Buying by outsiders is small. Good securities continue high and speculations are uncertain. The conflicts between railroads on rates, the legal obstructions put in the way of railroad reorganizations, and the interruption of trade by the strikes produce uncertainty in respect to the value of stocks and bonds.

News of the Week.

Henderson, formerly a dentist of Washington street, Brooklyn, committed suicide after prolonged dissipation, in Albany yesterday. ... Burglars entered the house once occupied by General Montgomery's widow near Barrytown, N. Y , and stole nearly 100 pieces of solid silverware. Eight persons were in the house at the time and not one heard any noise.

TUESDAY, 18.—There were 38 funerals of victims of the recent tornado at Xenia, Ohio, on Sunday. Over six inches of rain fell during the night, four and a half inches falling between 8 and 10 o'clock; this make 510 tons to the acre. It is said that every bridge in Greene County is destroyed. The reports are still coming in of ruined public buildings, churches and houses, and of the destruction of life ...Again a foolish young woman, residing in Tarrytown, N. Y., Miss Grace Morse, has run away and married her father's coachman....John O'Brien, a politician and contractor, was appointed receiver of the Broadway surface railway on Saturday....The Bohemian Communists in Chicago still refuse to go to work and threaten other workmen....The deficiency bills passed by the House of Representatives amount to $6,893,000, and the regular deficiency bill is still to be reported ...Queen Christina of Spain gave birth to a son yesterday, and there was great rejoicing....It is said that a messenger from the Queen requested Mr. Gladstone to avoid a dissolution of Parliament and that he replied, it is unavoidable if the Irish bill is defeated by a small majority. The debate on the bill continues....Heavy ice in the north Atlantic....Eminent men are arranging a public dinner in London to Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes.

SELF-DENIAL.—The Syrian maidens allowed their hair to be cut off that it might be twisted into cables for their war ships. The Carthaginian young women cut in pieces their costly silk robes, to make sheaths for their bowstrings. The children of Israel gave their jewels for the building of the tabernacle. Should not we be willing to give our influence, our time, our wealth and our lives to win the world for the Lord Jesus?

Market Report.

Review of the New York Market for Butter, Cheese, etc. Reported by DAVID W. LEWIS & Co., Produce Commission Merchants, 49 Pearl St., New York.
Commission on Butter, Eggs, Poultry, etc., is five per cent; Flour, Grain, etc., 2½ per cent.
Marking-plates furnished when desired.

NEW YORK, May 15, 1886.

BUTTER.—Receipts for the week, 32,631 pks.; exports 138 pks.

The first flush of feed is on through New England and New Jersey, and arrivals of fresh made butter have been plentiful and prices dropped 3a4c. on the week, closing at 20a21c. for the best N. Y. State creamery makes, with any hay made butter very low and slow. The season is early and the drop in price is early to correspond with it. There is still some old butter left. A lot of N. Y. State firkins were offered yesterday at 13c., and 150 packages of old butter from Minnesota was offered at 8c. The make is now fine in quality, and it is hoped there will be some buying for English markets. We quote:

Fancy creamery	20	@21
do dairy (selections)	18	@20
Good to fine	16	@18
Poor to common	8	@15

CHEESE.—Receipts for the week, 14,315 boxes; exports 11,132 boxes.

The old stock has been mostly sold and any odds and ends of it that are left are rejections, the finest qualities having been very closely taken. The early flush of feed has the same influence upon the cheese market as upon the butter, and prices are lower, closing at 8½c. as the top Skimmed cheese are practically worthless, the price here hardly paying for freight and boxes. In Broome, Chenango and Delaware counties last season the creameries that made butter only made the most money and gave by far the best satisfaction to patrons, and this year that course is again paying the best. We quote:

Factory, full cream, fine	8	@ 8½
" fair to good	7	@ 8
" skims	—	@ 1

EGGS.—Receipts for the week were 15,851 bbls. and 12,890 cases.

The receipts keep in excess of immediate wants and refrigerators are receiving stock. 11c. was a current price for good parcels in barrels through the week, and 11¼c. was made in the last half the week. We quote:

Near-by marks, fresh eggs	11	@12
Southern and Western eggs	10¾	@11¼

DEATHS.

Obituary notices five cents per line (nine word to the line.) For subscribers we will insert fifteen lines free; all lines in excess of that number will be charged same as non-subscribers.

BARNARD.—At Belleville, N. J., May 9, 1886, Catharine M. Winans, wife of Alanson Barnard, aged 69 years. An earnest, intelligent, humble Christian woman.

HOVER.—At Germantown, N. Y., on Monday A. M. the 10th inst., Alexander W. Hover, in the 66th year of his age. He was at the time of his death and had been for several years an acceptable elder in the Reformed Church. He was highly esteemed by all who knew him as a Christian. His business dealings were of the most exact character. He was a loving husband, a kind father, a noble citizen. He was always ready with hand and purse to help on every good work. His funeral took place at the church he loved Wednesday afternoon, the 12th inst. He had suffered long but patiently. He died in the triumphs of a living faith.

MARSTERS.—In Jersey City, on May 10, 1886, Silas W. Marsters, Jr., in the 27th year of his age.

"I am not afraid; it is all right," were among the last words he spoke, and precious indeed to the sorrowing ones, who found it very hard to say that it was "all right." For many years a consistent member of the Second Reformed Church, he lived a quiet, unassuming Christian life, patient through a long time of suffering, not a murmur escaping his lips, and a smile always lighting up the dear face wasted by disease. At the midnight hour the Master called for him and found him ready. "Blessed are those servants whom the Lord when he cometh shall find watching." T. F. V. C.

NATURE'S CURE FOR CONSTIPATION, Sick-Headache, AND DYSPEPSIA.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT

Thousands of Dollars are spent to secure the sanitary condition of our dwellings, but thousands neglect their own bodies by allowing a sluggish action of the bowels to become chronic. Chronic Constipation means the storage in the body of a mass of decomposing material, generating foul gases, which penetrate every part of the system, and utterly unfit the sufferer to take part in the battle of life.

Tarrant's Effervescent Seltzer Aperient Expels all waste matter from the system, acts gently on the skin and all the excretory organs. It never fails to cure Constipation, Biliousness, Sick Headache and Dyspepsia. It is pleasant to the taste, certain in its action, economical in price, and should be found in every household and carried by all travelers

AYER'S PILLS. Sugar-Coated Cathartic

If the Liver becomes torpid, if the bowels are constipated, or if the stomach fails to perform its functions properly, use Ayer's Pills. They are invaluable.

For some years I was a victim to Liver Complaint, in consequence of which I suffered from General Debility and Indigestion. A few boxes of Ayer's Pills restored me to perfect health.—W. T. Brightney, Henderson, W. Va.

For years I have relied more upon Ayer's Pills than anything else, to my bowels. These Pills are mild in action, and do their work thoroughly. I have used them with good effect, in cases of Rheumatism, Kidney Trouble, and Dyspepsia.—G. F. Miller, Attleborough, Mass.

Ayer's Pills cured me of Stomach and Liver troubles, from which I had suffered for years. I consider them the best pills made, and would not be without them.—Morris Gates, Downsville, N. Y.

I was attacked with Bilious Fever, which was followed by Jaundice, and was so dangerously ill that my friends despaired of my recovery. I commenced taking Ayer's Pills, and soon regained my customary strength and vigor.—John C Pattison, Lowell, Nebraska.

Last spring I suffered greatly from a troublesome humor on my side. In spite of every effort to cure this eruption, it increased until the flesh became entirely raw. I was troubled, at the same time, with Indigestion, and distressing pains in

The Bowels.

By the advice of a friend I began taking Ayer's Pills. In a short time I was free from pain, my food digested properly, the sores on my body commenced healing, and, in less than one month, I was cured.—Samuel D. White, Atlanta, Ga.

I have long used Ayer's Pills, in my family, and believe them to be the best pills made.—S. C. Darden, Darden, Miss.

My wife and little girl were taken with Dysentery a few days ago, and I at once began giving them small doses of Ayer's Pills, thinking I would call a doctor if the disease became any worse. In a short time the bloody discharges stopped, all pain went away, and health was restored.—Theodore Esling, Richmond, Va.

Life's Labor.

IT is well, sometimes, in the worry of life,
To pause and listen to others' strife;
To feel the jostling, to hear the beat
Of the wheels of time on the busy street,
That leads us home.

Oh, human hearts! how strange it seems,
With so much woe, and want, and need,
That ye gather strength in the trial hour,
And grasp the reins with a mightier power,
And still press on.

Is there nobler work in heaven above,
Where all is light, and joy, and love,
Than earth-born spirits do and dare,
In faith and hope, trusting His care
Who trod this path?

Then, weary ones, fresh courage take!
The victory won, the golden gate
Is opened wide, and God's own hand
Will lead you home to that blest land,
To rest at last.

Proposed Union of Churches in Japan.

THE following is the translation of a circular which has been forwarded to the pastors of many Japanese Christian Churches in this country:

Every careful observer of affairs in this, our country, is well aware that the time for its evangelization has already ripened. Those who are desirous to hear the truth are found everywhere throughout the land, so that the only regret is that the means of evangelization are not sufficient to meet the demands of the nation. The harvest is great, the laborers few. We earnestly pray that the Lord of the harvest may send His laborers into the field. When things are in this condition it is necessary that the Christians of Japan shall not only realize the fact but do all in their power to further the common cause and unite their hearts and resources to promote the glory of the Lord by the propagation of the pure religion of Jesus Christ. If on account of petty differences we continue to divide our strength, which is not sufficient even when it is united, the work will be hampered and the results most unfortunate, whilst many evils may arise from this want of unity of spirit and purpose. Moreover, if the churches are not united to-day, the dividing lines between Christian churches will become more firmly established and more prominent. We think this is the time, the golden opportunity for establishing a solid union, and for laying a firm foundation for a pure Church in our land. We are sure that in this way Japanese Christians will be saved from any possible evils and prejudices, therefore we humbly desire that the members of your church will take the matter into earnest consideration, and respectfully submit the following form of creed and Church government as the possible basis of the union we pray for.

I. CREED.

1. The Divine inspiration, authority and sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures.

2. The right and duty of private judgment in the interpretation of the Holy Scriptures.

3. The unity of the Godhead and the Trinity of the Persons therein.

4. The utter depravity of human nature in consequence of the fall.

5. The Incarnation of the Son of God, His work of atonement for the sins of mankind, and His mediatorial intercession and reign.

6. The justification of the sinner by faith alone.

7. The work of the Holy Spirit in the conversion and sanctification of the sinner.

8. The immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the body, the judgment of the world by our Lord Jesus Christ, the eternal blessedness of the righteous, and the eternal punishment of the wicked.

9. The Divine institution of the Christian ministry, and the obligation and perpetuity of the ordinances of Baptism and the Lord's Supper.

II. COUNCIL.

The Council of the churches to be divided into branch and general assemblies.

1. The branch or local assemblies will consist of lay representatives from the different churches, their pastors or acting pastors. These will decide questions and manage affairs in regard to the evangelization of their respective dioceses, the organization of their churches, education of the ministry, ordination and superintendence of ministers, and all other items which concern or relate to the general interest of their respective localities. But those things which concern each individual congregation shall be determined and decided according to the unanimous voice of the Church itself.

2. The general assembly will consist of representatives from the different churches, with their pastors or acting pastors, throughout the land. This assembly will manage the business, and decide questions concerning the general work of evangelization, education of the ministers, the constitution of the Church, and other items of importance which concern the whole body of the churches. The representatives of the respective churches to be sent to this general assembly in the following proportions:

Any church with communicants numbering less than two hundred shall be represented by one delegate. Those above two hundred, by two persons, etc.

III.

The name of the National Church or the body of churches thus united will be "The Church of Christ in Japan."—Tokyo Independent, April 3d.

International Sunday-School Lesson.

BY REV. JOHN C. VAN DEVENTER.

May 30th.—"Jesus Feeding Five Thousand."—John 6: 1-21.

Golden Text.—"Jesus said unto them, I am the bread of life."—JOHN 6: 35.

CENTRAL TRUTH.—"Give us this day our daily bread."—MATT. 6: 11.

INTRODUCTION.

THE fifth chapter is entirely taken up with the story of Jesus' visit to Jerusalem at the time when He healed the impotent man at Bethesda. It is not probable that He remained long in the city, after arousing the enmity of the Jews so thoroughly. The intervening time had been spent in Galilee, when the twelve were sent on their mission. About the time of their return from this mission, John the Baptist had been beheaded by Herod; so Jesus, wishing to have a little quiet time alone with His disciples, and to avoid the excitement consequent upon the death of John, visited the farther side of Galilee. This miracle of feeding the five thousand is the only one recorded by all four of the evangelists, and marks an important crisis in the life of Christ.

THE LESSON.

I. JESUS AND THE LOAVES AND FISHES.—VS. 1-14.

V. 1.—"After these things." This indefinite expression probably covers about a year of time, and brings us to the opening of the last year of the life of Jesus. "Which is the sea of Tiberias." The custom of Romanizing the names of places gave rise to a double set of names in all parts of the empire. This lake, well known to the natives as Galilee, would be known to those living in other lands only by its Roman name of Tiberias.

V. 2.—"A great multitude followed him." It seems probable that a short interval of time elapsed between the departure of Jesus and the gathering of the multitude, so that He had a little opportunity for private converse with His disciples. "They saw the miracles which he did." It was a wonder seeking company that gathered about Him on the hill slopes of that region.

V. 3.—"Jesus went up into a mountain." This describes His course immediately upon leaving the ship, and before the people had arrived.

V. 4.—"The passover was at hand." It would appear that Jesus did not visit Jerusalem at the time of this feast, but that He and His disciples enjoyed the quiet which the absence of the multitudes gave them. The mention of the approach of this feast accounts for the unusual assemblages of people, and explains the line of teaching adopted by Jesus at the time.

V. 5.—"When Jesus then lifted up his eyes and saw a great company come unto him." He had evidently been absorbed in His talk with the disciples, so that the approach of the crowd had not been noticed by any of the party until the people were near at hand. "He saith unto Philip, Whence shall we buy bread that these may eat." This question appears to have been asked by Jesus when the people were first noticed by Him, but the actual feeding did not take place until toward evening. A considerable interval of time may have been filled with instruction, which is not recorded.

V. 6.—"This he said to prove him." To test his spirit of hospitality as well as his faith in the Master.

V. 7.—"Two hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient for them." To Philip it appeared a simple impossibility to consider these people as their guests and attempt to provide for them. He failed to see the leading of Christ's question and gave his answer from a practical, earthly, but mistaken point of view.

Vs. 8, 9.—Andrew's statement was probably intended simply to emphasize Philip's answer. The "five barley loaves and two small fishes" would not have furnished a respectable meal for the disciples, and this was evidently all the provision accessible at the time.

V. 10.—"Jesus said, Make the men sit down." Without explaining His intentions, He assumed the position of host and directed the disciples to arrange the guests. The fresh spring growth of grass furnished comfortable couches for the men to recline upon, as if at a table. The exclusive reference to "men" does not imply that there were no women present, but that the company was chiefly composed of males, as any gathering about the time of the Passover would be.

V. 11.—"Jesus took the loaves." It is probable that the lad's scanty stock had been purchased by the disciples, who now presented it to their Master for His acceptance. "And when he had given thanks." In all this proceeding we have an example set for Christian householders to imitate. Instead of grumbling at short commons, let them be received with thanksgiving. "He distributed to the disciples." This was not merely as a matter of convenience in distribution, but in order to make them partakers in the gracious act.

V. 12.—"When they were filled." The provision thus miraculously made was sufficient to give each one "as much as he would." "Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost." This cannot refer to the crumbs dropped by the eaters upon the ground, but to the larger fragments which had not been needed by the people. Jesus evidently intended not only to teach a Divine economy, but also to reward the disciples for their gift.

V. 13.—"Filled twelve baskets with the fragments." Every Jew when away from home was provided with a small basket or pouch for the purpose of carrying food. Thus we see each of the disciples receiving as his share of the fragments more than the original supply.

V. 14.—"When they had seen the miracle." John uniformly speaks of miracles as "signs," a distinction which ought to be borne in mind in order to understand the words of Jesus which follow in the latter part of the chapter. "This is of a truth that Prophet that should come into the world." This is the prophet spoken of by Moses.

II. JESUS AND THE WINDS AND WAVES.—VS. 15-21.

V. 15.—"When Jesus therefore perceived that they would come and take him by force, to make him a king." This enthusiastic company of pilgrims on their way to the feast were evidently talking together of the possibility of taking Jesus in triumph to Jerusalem, and there proclaiming Him King, while they should declare themselves free and independent of the Roman Empire. Such a course would only have precipitated the catastrophe, so Jesus quietly left the company and sought solitude and God in the mountain.

V. 16.—"His disciples went down unto the sea." The place where the miracle had been wrought was on the northeast coast of Galilee; the mountain to which Jesus had retired was probably more to the north of the lake, so that the disciples were evidently intending to coast along until they could meet Jesus and take Him on board without the knowledge of the people.

V. 17.—"It was now dark, and Jesus was not come unto them." He had no other important lessons to teach these men that night, so He purposely absented Himself for a little while in order to manifest Himself more gloriously in the end.

V. 18.—"The sea arose by reason of a great wind that blew." One of the sudden squalls to which this mountain lake was subject came down upon them and hindered their progress, while endangering their lives.

V. 19.—"When they had rowed about five and twenty or thirty furlongs." They had succeeded in getting a little more than half way across the lake, when "they see Jesus walking on the sea." This simple act of supremacy over the waves filled the disciples with astonishment. We may suppose that immediately about Jesus the waves were as quiet as if there had never been any storm.

V. 20.—"It is I, be not afraid." Their fear had been due to ignorance. They were not afraid of Jesus, their well beloved Master.

V. 21.—When they knew that this apparent apparition was Jesus Himself, they gladly welcomed Him, "and immediately the ship was at the land whither they went." This may have been a miraculous hastening of the latter part of the voyage, but it seems more reasonable to understand the expression to mean simply that they had no further difficulty and were soon at the harbor.

LESSONS FOR TO-DAY.

1. Are you among those who follow Jesus?
2. You can find rest and strength for duty at Jesus' feet.
3. Christ makes our little gifts do great things.
4. Where Christ blesses the food there will be plenty.

5. "There is that giveth and yet increaseth."

6 Faith and obedience are more pleasing to Christ than demonstrations.

7. Without Jesus our lives are at the mercy of the tempests of sin.

8. Jesus is never far away from His disciples when they are in trouble or danger.

9. When He is welcomed to the soul He brings the calm of peace and safety.

To Hepatica.

HOODED darlings of the spring,
Rarest tints of purple wearing,
Why delay so long to come
Boisterous winds and showers daring?

We are tired of hothouse bloom,
Forest lilies, royal roses,
Pine we now for woodland things
Scent of spring, the breeze discloses.

Shall I find you, sweets, to-day,
If I to the woods shall hie me,
Coy and dainty, rarely hued,
Bluebird crooning near thee, may be?

Yes, you're here at last, my loves,
Fair as in the vanished springtides.
Happy months to hold such flowers,
Every bud a blessing hides!

Sweethearts, ye are just in time,
For a little maid I know,
Sadly lingering winter out,
Glad of you will be, I trow.

And I think, perchance, your bloom
Radiant-winged from winter's grave
Hope again will wake in her,
Tender buds, so sweet and brave!

A Father's Surprise.

A BOY was once made the happy owner of a jack-knife. When a boy has a knife it must whittle; and this knife kept up its share of chips. But the boy had a head as well as a knife. With the strong steel blade he was ever fashioning something for a purpose. He never made the shavings fly merely to make the stick smaller or time less. While he was carving the wood he was carrying out an idea. And when you see a boy do this, look out for a big man in a few years. One day this boy presented his father with a model of a machine which had come from under his jack-knife. The father glanced at it for a moment. He was not able to take in the design, and he waited for no explanation. He saw at once that the whittling had been immense, and time had been given to the toy. This enraged him, as he was a severely practical man, and could see no use in such trifling employment. He snatched the pretty machine from the boy's hand and threw it upon the ground, stamping it to pieces.

Soon after this the father sent his son to learn the trade of a blacksmith. His employer quickly discovered more than the ordinary talent in him. Again his jack-knife was at work. Again the same model was made. With pride he explained it to the blacksmith. At once it was recognized as a useful invention. It was a power-loom, the first ever made. A loom was then constructed out of substantial material. It worked with satisfaction. A loom factory was then established. A trade was built up. The boy had half the profits. One year after the invention was tested the blacksmith wrote to the father that he would make him a visit, and bring him a visitor, who was the inventor of the celebrated power-loom. What was the astonishment of the old gentleman when his son was introduced as the inventor, and when he told the father that the invention was but the model he had kicked to pieces last year. Let boys whittle as long as they whittle out ideas.—Baptist Weekly.

Truth Stranger than Fiction.

THE Rev. Dr. Harsha, of Omaha, narrates the following incidents as told to him by John Dixon, of Dixon City, Ill.

"General Winfield Scott, then a young man, was stationed at Fort Snelling, at that day perhaps the remotest outpost of the United States. When the Indian outbreak known as the Black Hawk War was inaugurated, some militia from Illinois proffered their services to aid in conquering the savages. And with a view to mustering them into the service of the United States two lieutenants were sent by Scott to the then village of Dixon. The one of these was a very fascinating, good-looking, easy-mannered, affable and fluent young gentleman, the other equally pleasant-looking, but exceedingly modest young man. On the morning when the mustering in was to take place a tall, gawky, slab-sided, homely young man, dressed in a home-made suit of blue jeans, presented himself to the two lieutenants as the captain of the recruits and was duly sworn in. This was he who afterwards became the President of the United States—the lamented Lincoln. One of the lieutenants, the modest youth, was he who fired the first gun from Sumter, Major Anderson. The other, and he who administered the oath, was in after years the President of the Southern Confederacy, Jefferson Davis."

Dr. Harsha was in the book rooms of Carter Brothers, New York, where he chanced to repeat these coincidences to a friend; an elderly gentleman, who was sitting near by, and was an auditor, arose and remarked that he was happy to be able to confirm the facts as given by Mr. Dixon, as he was the chaplain at Fort Snelling at the time, and was fully able to corroborate each statement. A by-stander then gave this additional testimony: That Mr. Lincoln had often been heard to say that the first time he had ever taken the oath of allegiance to the United States it was administered to him by Jefferson Davis.—Exchange.

PERHAPS the greatest mental peril in which well-to-do young people of the present day stand, is that of literary dissipation. There are thousands of young men and young women, who seem to know no other way of using (or abusing) their education than by keeping up a constant surfeit of sensational stories, "religious" or "secular;" and sometimes this habit is even talked of as "improving the mind." One might as safely keep up a constant succession of whiskey-drams with the idea of improving the body.—S. S. Times.

I HAVE been benefited by praying for others; for by making an errand to God for them I have gotten something for myself.—Rutherford.

Horsford's Acid Phosphate.
Admirable Results in Fevers.

Dr. J. J. RYAN, St. Louis, Mo., says: "I invariably prescribe it in fevers; also in convalescence from wasting and debilitating diseases, with admirable results. I also find it a tonic to an enfeebled condition of the genital organs."

That Tired Feeling

The warm weather has a debilitating effect, especially upon those who are within doors most of the time. The peculiar, yet common, complaint known as "that tired feeling," is the result. This feeling can be entirely overcome by taking Hood's Sarsaparilla, which gives new life and strength to all the functions of the body.

"I could not sleep; had no appetite. I took Hood's Sarsaparilla and soon began to sleep soundly; could get up without that tired and languid feeling; and my appetite improved." R. A. SANFORD, Kent, Ohio.

Strengthen the System

Hood's Sarsaparilla is characterized by three peculiarities: 1st, the combination of remedial agents; 2d, the proportion; 3d, the process of securing the active medicinal qualities. The result is a medicine of unusual strength, effecting cures hitherto unknown. Send for book containing additional evidence.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla tones up my system, purifies my blood, sharpens my appetite, and seems to make me over." J. P. THOMPSON, Register of Deeds, Lowell, Mass.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla beats all others, and is worth its weight in gold." I. BARRINGTON, 130 Bank Street, New York City.

James Pyle's PEARLINE

IS UNEQUALED.

One trial will convince the most skeptical that it will do the work better, quicker, and easier than anything yet invented.

FROM THE BOSTON BEACON.

Next Monday will be washing day in a majority of families. It is not a day of comfort, as a general thing, and anything that can be introduced to lighten the labors of the occasion should be gladly welcomed. Just at present we know of nothing more conducive to this end than JAMES PYLE'S PEARLINE, which is announced as the best thing ever invented to make washing easy. How nearly it fulfils this claim thousands of housekeepers who have tested its merits can attest. It is sold by all grocers, and this announcement is timely, for it gives an opportunity to procure the article before Monday morning.

Een-dracht maakt macht.

VOL. LVII.—No. 21. WHOLE No. 2913. NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 26, 1886. $2.65 A YEAR IN ADVANCE. No. 48 CHURCH STREET.

EDITORS: Rev. JOHN M. FERRIS, D.D. Rev. N. H. VAN ARSDALE.
ASSOCIATE EDITOR: MRS. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

IF A MEMBER of a family is wounded by accident he or she is a first care to all the others. He is in every mind and heart all the day and through the night. Any self denial needed is endured cheerfully and no endeavor withheld which may tend to relieve and cure. Indeed, the wounded member rules the house, and his wishes are more potent than commands. Our home missionary board has received a wound, a hurt. At a time when summoned to put forth its utmost ability to provide for a large and most promising territory and population, and when answering joyfully to the summons, it receives a crippling blow and is almost prostrated by its severity. There is just one thing for the Church to do—to heal the hurt. It is a first duty, we are not certain that it ought not to be regarded as the first duty, to be discharged. So far as the Board is concerned the injury is as accidental as when a round breaks in a ladder long trustworthy and hurls to the ground, maimed and stunned, the fireman bent on the rescue of endangered life. None of the ordinary precautions in the supervision of accounts has been neglected. Wrongdoing has been concealed by the doer, as it constantly is, until concealment became impossible. What the Church has to do is to close up and heal the wound, and it should be done at once. Not for one moment should we hesitate in our advance in the Northwest, rather we should give prompt and decisive proof of our immovable resolution to do with our might what our hands have received from God to do. It will be no novelty if large success and true honor come out of trial nobly borne.

THE GENERAL SYNOD will be in session on Wednesday of next week. Much will depend on the spirit which may control it. Merely conventional, formal, perfunctory action will be a mockery. Business is to be considered on which decisive results depend. These years are of the greatest importance to this branch of the Church of Christ, and unless present opportunities are improved succeeding years are likely to become unimportant. Broad fields for missionary endeavor, fields for churches and schools of every grade and in need of both, are as open before us as they can be. What has been done on them has received the blessing of God; but what is yet to be done, and to be done soon or not at all by us, far exceeds what has been done. At this supreme moment when the Church needs to be lifted to a higher plane of bold, vigorous action, and heroic, self-denying endeavor; when the Church needs to be inspired with a spirit promptly, enthusiastically, cheerfully, hopefully responsive to the calls of God, and needs to be aroused to a sense of her ability and stewardship, no one can tell how much depends on this Synod. If the voice of the King shall be heard at the sessions, if the Spirit of God shall control our representatives, wisdom and power will come from them to us. God has named Himself the hearer and answerer of prayer. Let us pray for the Synod.

TWILIGHT SERVICES.—During the hot months of July and August some churches continue to hold two regular preaching services on the Sabbath day, usually morning and evening; others omit the second service altogether, and have but one service in the morning; others again have a regular morning service, and then a short, early twilight service in the evening, at which preaching is omitted, the pastor making, instead, an informal address, ten or fifteen minutes in length, thereby leaving more time for singing, prayer, the reading of Scripture, and Christian conference, if thought advisable.

Pastors and churches who have given the last method a fair trial speak well of it. They say they are careful not to have the services extend over forty-five minutes; that they are better attended, more enjoyed, and seem more profitable than in the old way; that it has the three-fold advantage of varying from the usual formal preaching service, of dispensing with artificial light which in summer increases the temperature of the room to the discomfort of the audience, and of enabling the people to spend an unbroken evening with their families in the seclusion and quiet of home.

DR. BISHOP concludes this week his concise discussion of the Hebrew Vowel Points. The subject is important. There are those who believe that a great battle over the points is imminent. The revised extracts from the Vedder Lectures printed in this journal are valuable aids to an intelligent decision. Dr. Bishop wishes to make the language of Art. VI. in last week's paper, more explicit. He would have it: "The Keri in the margin does not correct the vowels to conform them to the consonants, but the reverse. The vowels stand; it is the consonants that are changed in the marginal notes."

"LET HIM that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall." David fell, Peter fell. David could conquer armies, but failed to conquer himself. Peter was bold to rashness, was a man of enthusiastic courage, was the sort of man to lead a forlorn hope with impetuous daring, yet played the coward before a serving maid and denied that he was a disciple of Jesus of Nazareth. Good men have been overcome of evil, and one act of wrong doing often leads to another and to yet another. The Church is to condemn wrongdoing, but to endeavor to restore the wrongdoer. The Church is vindicated and justified in condemning the deed, and is then to strive to reclaim and strengthen the one overcome with temptation. "Brethren," wrote the great Apostle to the Nations, "if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such a one in the spirit of meekness; considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted." Temptation and trial await every man and he is fortunate indeed who is enabled to endure and overcome them. "There goes John Newton, but for the grace of God," said one who had been plucked as a brand from the burning, as he looked on a malefactor conducted along the street on his way to punishment. One of the chief reasons we have for thankfulness is that we have been kept in the hour of temptation. "Be ye kind one to another," the voice of God says to His children, "tenderhearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you." To restore, by the grace of God, and not to crush; to save and not to destroy, is the work given to the Church by Him who came into the world to seek and to save.

A COMMERCIAL AGENCY reckoned and last week published the cost of the strikes. It claimed, no doubt correctly, that the wage earners had lost nearly three millions of dollars, the employers and tradesmen nearly three millions more, and that about twenty-four millions of capital had been withheld from use until the troubles should be adjusted. A good part of this, however, is temporary, and will be made up hereafter. But why do not men who wish to influence public opinion deal fairly and without partiality with all classes? Why does not some commercial agency reckon as accurately as possible how large a part of the savings of the nation has passed, by unfair and dishonest means, during the past ten or fifteen years into the hands of a few individuals? There are hundreds of millions of securities on which no interest or dividend has been paid for more than a year. The large and thrifty middle class of citizens holds a large proportion of those securities or has been forced by necessity to part with them during the past twelve months for much less than they cost. So the capital and the income of the great middle class have been seriously reduced. The money invested in those securities was money saved, and a few men by their dishonest tricks have obtained possession of it. Trade has felt the effect of this crippling of the middle class, and labor has felt it. These investors have been compelled to contract their purchases, to live on a reduced income. Everybody now knows just how this has come about. Everybody knows that when what has cost thirty thousand dollars has been capitalized at sixty and seventy thousand, and that when the securities representing these seventy thousand dollars have been sold to the great middle class, that the purchasers have been cheated and robbed and that dollars by the scores of millions have passed into the possession of the managers of these schemes. A great many have learned to their cost that interest has been paid by the sale of securities, paid long enough to induce them to buy. Now their investments yield nothing. Why has not some commercial agency courage and honesty and good sense enough to investigate this matter and tell what it finds? This is a permanent or at best a long-lived loss to the great middle class; the loss by the strikes is largely temporary. The savings of the nation have been secured by a few men; to save again an equal amount is the work of years. Some means should be found to put an end to the dishonest practices by which such evil has been wrought, especially during the past ten or fifteen years. At least it should be condemned by public opinion.

Exordiums.

MR. EDITOR: An eye witness of the scene when the Rev. Dr. Laidlie, the first English preacher of our denomination, began his ministry in this city states that the service comprehended both an exordium remotum and an exordium proximum. It may be of interest to some of your readers to offer a word of explanation upon the matter. I recall a conversation I had many years ago with the Rev. Peter Labagh, D.D., of Harlingen, N. J., in which he spoke of the usages of the fathers. The first exordium was delivered just before the second or chief prayer of the service. It was always brief, never exceeding five minutes, and was intended to suggest the general subject of the discourse, and awaken an interest in advance in its consideration. The second (proximum) exordium usually arose from the connection of the text. This the minister expounded, and then announced the divisions of his discourse, after which he said, "Before going farther let us remember the poor," whereupon the black bags were circulated in the congregation, and when these were brought back and set up in front of the pulpit, the preacher resumed and finished his sermon. My impression is that his latter custom of arresting the discourse in order to receive the offerings for the poor is still continued in the mother country. When it was discontinued here, I do not know, but presume that it was at the beginning of the century.

The exordium remotum died out in the churches generally about the same time, but has survived (in part) in the Collegiate Church to this day. When I came to New York in 1849 I found it em ployed by my colleagues, although not constantly, save in the case of Dr. DeWitt, who I think retained it in the morning service until the close of life. In this I have followed him (haud passibus æquis), partly, because it is pleasant to retain an ancestral relic, and partly, because the custom is a wholesome discipline for the minister and may be made very useful to the people. What is said must be appropriate, sententious, weighty and complete in itself. No words can be wasted, and the shot must hit the middle of the bull's eye every time. Of course, the most accomplished of ministers would not succeed always, but when he does the result well repays his trouble.

I recall a specimen related to me many years ago by the late venerable Abraham Van Nest. It was one that he had heard from the lips of Dr. William Linn, whom uniform tradition represents to have been by far the most eloquent of the colleagues of Livingston, and whose ministry extended from 1786 to 1805. What he said was in substance as follows, for of course through two reporters separated by so many years the exact wording could hardly be retained: "The Scriptures, my brethren, are the Word of God, and they hold back nothing concerning His righteous judgment upon sinners. They set forth the wrath to come in vivid and appalling imagery; a bottomless pit, an unquenchable fire, a never-dying worm. Hence a faithful and conscientious minister must often come to the pulpit with heavy tidings. He must set forth the wages of sin, whether men will hear or forbear. He must dwell upon the intolerable woes of perdition to arouse the careless to seek the great salvation. But it is my privilege on the present occasion to speak of a very different theme, nay, one precisely opposite. It is the rewards of the righteous, the joys of the redeemed in heaven, to which I shall call your attention this morning." Mr. Van Nest said the contrast thus effectively made produced a deep impression upon his mind, as indeed it must have done to be recalled so distinctly after the lapse of more than fifty years. Possibly some might say that this instance justifies the old remark that an exordium remotum was occasionally remotissimum, yet it is hard to see why the category of contrast may not be as pertinent as any other. The custom of having such an exordium was a good one and undoubtedly useful in its day, but whether it could be profitably revived in our own times is a question about which there might well be two opinions.

T. W. Chambers.

THE PROPOSITION for one national Christian Church in Japan has, among other excellences, an engaging feature especially attractive to those who regard a free representative government as an end greatly to be desired for all nations. The Council, as the chief body of the united church is called, is to rest upon a broad foundation of local assemblies, consisting of the pastors, who are the free choice of the congregations, and of lay delegates selected by the churches, and the Council itself is to be selected by the churches and to include all the pastors. Such a representative government is already in existence in Japan and is doing its work to the great satisfaction of all concerned, the Japanese members being no less efficient than their American and European associates. At the last meeting of the Synod or Assembly of this body, the Rev. Motoichiro Oghimi, of Tokyo, presided with dignity and ability. This body spent four days in considering and deciding upon the affairs of the United Church of Christ in Japan, which consists of forty-four churches and over four thousand adult members. How great must be the power of such an example of self-government resulting in effective activity and growing prosperity! How impressive must be the contrast with a civil government, thoroughly despotic only a few years ago, and even now having no legislative body consisting of representatives chosen by the people! The fact is, the Christian Church, not that of the Papacy but of Protestants, is teaching Oriental peoples how to establish and conduct free, representative, constitutional governments, and is doing this without giving offence.

"Old Colony" Papers.

BELATED TOPICS.

I.

ALMOST the only drawback on the satisfaction of writing "Old Colony papers" is the fact that, as a former editor of the Intelligencer used to say, "You can't put a peck measure into a quart cup." The Old Colony range takes in about everything in heaven or on earth, and those two rather extensive localities are a perfect universe of topics,—so that I suppose a Methusaleh, if he had a turn for journalism, might go on old-colonizing for the entire term of his (un) natural life, interspersing his comments on the time with reminiscences of Adam and sage counsels to the youthful Noah. But by the time he celebrated his nine hundred and sixty-ninth birth day, I am sure that he would have accumulated an ark-full of topics, most of them already ancient history, and all of them labeled "The Unattained."

"Each mortal has his Carcassonne."

It is with a tender thought of this kind that I thrust my hand into the bulging pigeon hole of belated topics, to see what will come forth.

Why, here is Jeff. Davis. The man himself is belated, as well as his recent ghostly reappearance in the cities of the South, and the Hamlets all over the country are vexing themselves with the question: "What may this mean that thou, dead corse, in complete steel revisit'st thus the glimpses of the moon?"

If anything was needed to make us all realize how by-gone a thing the rebellion is, this sudden flicker of those extinguished flames, this dying echo of that old shout, would answer the purpose. There was a time when such gatherings and cries had a Cassandra meaning, as terrible as anything in history. Now they are a reminiscence and a sentiment, a reflection like sheet-lightning on the horizon, whose innocuous glare only reminds us of our safety. In almost any other country of the world, such an ebullition of old rebellion would have lowered government bonds, and would have been sternly repressed. Here it has done us all good. We are not nearly as much scared by our Polaks and Slavs, and anarchists of one sort or another, as we should otherwise have been. And it has done our Southern brethren a world of good to relieve their minds once more about the "lost cause," and to realize on the very largest and most spectacular scale how utterly lost that cause is, and how utterly glad they are in their hearts that it is lost.

Jeff. himself is the vivid and picturesque embodiment of that cause. I remember him in the U. S. Senate, just before he stalked out of it, as a striking figure, with a poise of head and a pride of bearing which marked him in all that assembly as a king of men. He crawls out now as a decrepit, wrinkled old man, the shadow of his former self, and the effigy of a still more wrecked and disappointed hope. It will do him good, too. He has been the one scapegoat of the cause, as well on the Southern side as on ours. And it is but fair that his last days should be cheered by the knowledge that even abortive republics are not ungrateful. I confess that, after all, I have never seen the justice of condoning the rebellion of everybody else, and pouring all the vials on the head of this one man who happened to be placed at the head, and who has the pride of conscience which will not let him even seem to acknowledge that he was wrong. It is a most happy thing, that the men of the South have a less stubborn moral sense. But I am free to confess that there is something more imposing in the old man's attitude, than in that of the many who went into the rebellion against their inmost convictions, and hastened immediately after the defeat of their armies to resume their part in the government, as if they had been engaged in a mischievous lark or an April Fool escapade. At any rate, Jefferson Davis has shrewdly made a solitary and picturesque place for himself in history, which he could not have secured by a more "sensible" and patriotic course.

I know of no other association of my old friend, Anson D. F. Randolph, with Jefferson Davis, other than as a belated topic, and the fact that he too has stirred up my old (and young) recollections,—by a card announcing his removal to Twenty-third street, with the following written on the back, "Thirty-five years on Broadway!" It brought up vividly before me the little shop on the N. W. corner of Amity street, or rather next to the corner, for it was only the inner half of a twenty-five feet front,—what would be called now-a-days a "book-stall." I remember with perfect distinctness (it must have been during the first year of his occupancy) the first time I entered the little store. A book of poetical selections in the window had caught my eye, and I stepped in to price it. It was an imported book, and was far out of reach of my juvenile purse.* But I was so pleasantly received and the little book-room was so cozy, that I soon felt at home, and it became a favorite lounging place. It is such a comfort to find a store which you can enter without having a brisk clerk step up and ask "What can I do for you to-day?" and without a consequent sneaking feeling if you have to say, "Nothing in particular." What a narrow, if not sordid, ideal of a shop is that which rises no higher than buying and selling? Mr. Randolph has always had the fine art of being the host in his store, as other men are in their houses. Business with him is a daily reception. His customers are his guests, and even his cronies. He always finds time for a pleasant greeting, and seldom needs to talk about the weather. He has the happy faculty of saying the uppermost thing in his own mind, perhaps a little story or the latest joke or the topic of the town, or quite as likely a delicate and quiet sentiment which will by-and-by appear in one of his thoughtful and finished poems.

So that "Randolph" is an "institution" which New York could not well dispense with, a friendly link between the best men (and women) of two or three generations. And though that "good gray head" has lost its raven gloss and some of its tuftest strength, let us hope that he may long make glad the city with the streams of a pure and godly literature, and gladden our hearts with a kindly and unconventional hospitality which no money can purchase or compensate.

Another belated topic, suggestive of long past and precious associations, is the dedication of the Suydam Street Church in New Brunswick. I could not attend on that Easter Day, which brought such joy to the little band who have carried through this heroic undertaking, and to their friends who crowded the house with their congratulations. But to me the beauty and completion of the building, important as it is to the Church's work, is a small matter to the lesson of courage and consecration of which this Church is the enduring monument. If ever there was a work of faith, a labor of love, and a patience of hope, we have it in the history of this almost unique enterprise. A faith of the same quality as that which led Abraham to go out unto a place which he was to receive for an inheritance, not knowing whither he went; or which moved Noah to prepare an ark to the saving of his house; or which led the patriarchs to dwell in tents, looking for a city whose maker and builder is God! Few have any idea of the sacrifices and the holy pluck of this little company, nor the singleness of their aim in thus providing a new district of our ecclesiastical capital with a church of our order. If this spirit of enterprise and devotion had characterized our denomination as a whole, we should now be the Reformed Church of America, as well as "in" it.

It is so common a thing to speak of Mr. Gladstone as the "Grand old man," that he has attained a unique title, a sort of Melchizedek degree in statesmanship without predeces or or successor, and is spoken of as Wm. E. Gladstone, G. O. M. And he deserves it. But there is no grander old man to me than William H. Campbell. At a time when most men are glad to pose and repose in otiose dignity, he starts upon a new and laborious (and, in the eyes of the world, a very humble) career with all the ardor of a last year's licentiate. To occupy a vacant corner of the Lord's harvest field, to gather into a Gospel home a few plain people of the suburbs, to add another centre of influence to the dear old Church which he has served so faithfully and in so many ways for more than half a century—above all, to spend the remainder of his days in the work of preaching Christ and saving souls, for which he has a genuine passion—counting it all joy to literally spend and to be spent for these ends, has been his sole ambition and his exceeding great reward. There was absolutely nothing in the worldly outlook to lure him on, or to inspire confidence. But the will of God seemed clear, and with a faith which was not only serene but exultant he entered upon it. I do not think it ever occurred to him that there could be a failure, whatever shape the result might take, or whatever part he might have in it.

* I bided my time, however, and have the book now in my library.

And step by step the God of Abraham has opened up the way, inspired the right counsel, supplied the means, built the house, brought in the people, poured out of His Spirit. If to be childlike in faith, rejoicing in tribulation, strong in the Lord alone, enduring as seeing Him who is invisible, meekly and gladly bringing the treasures of a life-time of honors, learning, courtesy, energy to the humblest and most self-denying ministries, is a stirring and refreshing spectacle, then we all ought to be strengthened in our Christian work and lifted to higher levels of faith and consecration by the example of this dear man of God (who, I hope, will pardon me this allusion to him). The Labor Question.

WE select two sensible papers from those which have come under our eye:

A PUZZLE FOR SOCIALISTS.

There is not, and can hardly be, a business in the world in which an intellectual faculty possessed by one man, and often incommunicable, is not essential to develop the full faculties of the remainder of the employés. Take a brewery with a thousand hands, and organize it on any Socialist scheme you like,—the best, because the most logical, being absolute equality of rights, or equality modified only by needs, so that the man with five children shall have something more than the man with four. When the organization is complete, a forgotten person, called the "chemist," probably a third the size of a drayman, and with no muscles at all, calmly remarks that he certainly does not intend to "work," that he has a liking for a studious life and expensive experiments, and that he consequently must have fifty shares. That is a frightful blow to Socialist principles; but the brewery depends for existence on producing fine beer; all the vatmen on earth cannot produce fine beer without the little chemist's brain to guide them; as before, he cannot profitably be flogged or killed, and what is to be done but yield? It is right to yield, too, for he is not a brewster like another, but a man who adds new utility and value to every creature in the brewery, to the dumb animals which deliver good beer and not bad, and even to the very vats. He, and not the body of workmen, constitutes the difference between success and failure. Every workman ought in common justice to give him something for the help which so greatly increases his own value in the world; and human nature being what it is, every workman will in the long run be compelled to do it, for the chemist, if he strikes, stops work as completely as if the whole community struck. He is not the thousandth fraction of the whole, but in certain respects the equivalent of the whole, and he cannot be pared down to a lesser mass. Brewing may stop under a Socialist régime; but if it goes on, the chemist-brewer will have something out of every worker in the brewery, though all the Socialists in creation protest that he shall not.

But chemical knowledge is a rare specialty? Well, let us take something wanted in every large business—and under Socialism, businesses will tend to be large—and that is the faculty of command. One man, perhaps, in five hundred has something in his brain—men do not know what, and so when they believed in a God they called it a "gift"—which enables him so to guide the five hundred that they are, often by 50 per cent, but we will say by 10 per cent, more efficient, produce one tenth more work, and better work, with the same effort. He is not one of those five hundred, but fifty-one of them, and has not only a right to be paid as such, but he will be paid. He has only to step down into the crowd, and in a week every man will know that he has been fined one-tenth of his whole money-producing power,—that is, when distribution is equal, of his whole wages. "The workman will bear that," says a reflective Socialist, "and put up with the inferior foreman who consents to be equal." Will he? Just test that when the work to be done is serious or dangerous, when, for instance, wages are falling, from lack of demand, to starvation point, as happens constantly in trades regulated by taste; or when the "community" is one of sailors navigating a ship, or of soldiers intent on not being defeated. Will men give nothing special, then, to the Flaxman, the Nelson, or the Napoleon; or will any one of the three, conscious that in him is a power worth that of the whole community, consent to be paid as one of the throng, or to do the daily stint of hand labor in doing which he, and therefore the whole community, will lose the intellectual power which makes him so valuable? There is not a great business, a corporation, a State, without such a man in it, whose commodity, being a monoply, must be bought at his own price. Yet if it must be bought, the Socialist idea fails; for in the possession of anything of which the seller fixes the value is contained the potentiality of accumulation, the very practice Socialism denounces.

But then, we shall be told, the man with this potential power of ten men in him may not care to use it, may even prefer to live, as to external circumstances, as an equal among equals. Certainly he may. No sensible man has ever denied that, granted adequate motive, society can be organized into a series of Benedictine monasteries, in which all are equally poor, because all are attracted by other things than pecuniary advantage. The desire of money is only one whip, and, as the whole history of the world shows, by no means the strongest whip. Nobody paid Marcus Curtius, or could make him leap by money. Only, those who expect crowds, and continuous crowds—whole generations, in fact—of Marcus Curtiuses, are entirely ignorant of the elementary facts of human nature. They might as well demand a race of men seven feet high. They will have to put up with men of average morale, as they have with men of average height and girth; and they will find that among such men, the man with a necessary intellectual power will not, in the first place, do hand-work, which, for him, lessens that power; that he will have seclusion, which costs money; that he will have ease when he is tired, which costs more money; that he will indulge in intellectual tastes, which cost much money; and that generally—with reserves for the finer sympathies, which, we agree with the Socialists, time will develop, or rather will develop if Socialism does not kill Christianity, and with it the capacity of suffering serenely—he will make the most of himself he can. If he will not, why should the hand-laborer do so? And if the hand-laborer does not, he will be lazy, and then the Socialist will have to extort his tale of bricks by the lash, and will find, in spite of all the systems ever coined, that the whipper is, while whipping lasts, the superior of the whippee.—The Spectator, London.

THE ROOT OF THE LABOR TROUBLE.

At the opening of this century it was predicted that the new applications of machinery would end in making society itself mechanical. The prediction seems likely to be fulfilled, although not perhaps in the sense in which it was intended.

Far more important than any effect upon industry itself has been the effect of machinery upon the industrial classes. Until the establishment of the factory system those who served each other in the relation of employer and employed, or even in that of master and serf, lived in some kind of personal contact. They actually saw each other face to face, and found some modus vivendi on the basis of a mutual recognition of their humanity. For when men thus meet, no faults in the law which determines their relations, no class vices in the more powerful elements of society, can keep them from recognizing each other as men, and as entitled to human consideration in some degree. We still see the effects of this in the position occupied by the body servants and household servants of the rich. The coachman, the butler, the housemaid, the valet, all occupy positions which are distasteful to most men. But they find these positions made more tolerable because their rank as human beings, their possession of tastes and wills and tempers of their own, are facts which their employers are forced to recognize in some sort. The many complaints we hear of their want of deference are admissions that they are neither nothings nor nobodies in the lives of those they serve. More than half the désagrêments of modern housekeeping are due probably to the fact that many dependents have no other way than that of offence to assert their rights to human recognition.

In the case of the modern workman, there is in most cases no such personal recognition. The workman in the modern system of industry is generally no more than a means to an end. He is not recognized as an end in himself, i. e., as a human being. He is a "hand." No nexus but that of a bargain and a payment connects him with his master. The case is still worse when the master is a great corporation. In that case he is serving an impersonal and conscienceless body, none of whose members are known to the workman or feel any responsibility for him. He comes in contact only with an agent or manager, who himself is but a means to an end, viz., large dividends. The agent has less discretion than the actual employer of labor. In most cases he has no discretion except to judge which of two courses will best contribute to large profits for the corporation. He cannot do anything out of simple human consideration for the laborers he employs. If he did so, he would take the risk of dismissal in favor of some more efficient dividend-earning instrument.

The essential vice of slavery was that it treated persons as things. Are we not in danger of reproducing its substance under the forms of liberty? The working classes evidently begin to suspect that we are coming to that. There is that in every one of them which rises up against this tendency, and it is by no means the baser self in them which rebels. When our old Norse and Teutonic forefathers wished to inflict a deadly insult on an enemy, they stuck upon a post near the highway an inscription which proclaimed him a nithing—a nothing, a nobody. There are myriads of people in this free land of ours who toil for us behind stone walls or beyond the prairie distances, who are beginning to feel that this placard is posted for them on every highway of their lives. They are nothing to anyone,—mere "hands"—instruments to social ends and not ends in themselves. It is true that outside the industrial sphere there are recognitions of their manhood. The State recognizes it in investing them with the suffrage and in defending their personal rights. The Church recognizes it in proclaiming that they have immortal spirits, for which there is an infinite concern. The school recognizes it in claiming their children for instruction. But State, Church and school make up a very small part of their lives, and through the great majority of their waking hours they have no evidence that the community thinks of them as men.

But it is said: "Our social system is impossible upon any other footing. Our economic arrangements assume in man only the motives of avarice and the desire of progress. It is useless to ask that the wage-earners be regarded except as elements in an industrial problem. Industrial success depends on the exclusion of all but the strictly economic elements from that problem, and on bringing all our transactions to a strictly business basis." If this be true, then our industrial system will be a short-lived one. It will not see the end, perhaps not the middle of the coming century. Already great masses of men are pro claiming by their unrest and dissatisfaction that they find this system intolerable. When they become conscious of their strength they will overthrow it.

But we need not believe that it is true. We believe it possible to infuse a new spirit into all our industrial methods and arrangements, which will put an end to all serious danger of social revolution. We say a new spirit; not new methods. We are sufficiently disciples of Carlyle to disbelieve in the solution of any moral difficulty by mere changes in method. Neither arbitration, nor coöperation, nor profit-sharing, will save us from the consequences of perverted relations between workmen and their employers. These are but new bottles which are sure to burst if we put the old wine into them. Indeed, they already have burst, for each of these three in its turn has proved a failure under the stress of mutual suspicion and distrust.

It is not change of method we need, but a change in the spirit which controls our industrial relations. There must be a regard for human beings as more precious than gold,—as ends in themselves, while gold is but the means, whereas we now make them the means and gain the end. There must be a determination to secure right natural relations between all the classes engaged in the great order of industrial life.

As "the streets of Jerusalem were kept clean by every man sweeping before his own door," so in this case each of us must begin the new reformation within the range of our own action and influence. All that is needed is the purpose to touch upon no human life, however lightly, without the recognition of the common humanity and the brotherhood it establishes for us. In store and office, in street and car, no human being must be treated simply as our instrument, our convenience, our tool; but a sense of a higher bond of mutual service must pervade all our intercourse. The ideal is no impossibility; it is realized already in men of the truest courtesy,—the courtesy of sincerity. When it passes from the few to the many, our difficulties will be in a fair way to solution.—The American, Philadelphia.

....THE PARTICULAR SYNOD OF CHICAGO met in the First Reformed Church of Chicago on May 5th, and adjourned on the 6th. Rev. W. H. Phraner preached the sermon, from 1 Cor. 9: 22, 23, on the evening of the first day of the session. Rev. D. Broek was elected President, Rev. E. Winter, Vice-President, and Rev. Messrs. A. Vennema and W. H. Phraner, Temporary Clerks.

A petition was received from seven churches of the Classis of Iowa for the formation of the Classis of Dakota. As the Classis of Iowa had taken no action, the request was referred to the Synod of next year. The request of the Second Church of Kalamazoo, endorsed by the Classis of Grand River, to be transferred to the Classis of Michigan was granted.

The report on the State of Religion concludes with these sentences:

In comparing the reports of the present year with the last, it will be seen that there is gratifying increase in the following particulars: There are 418 more families in the Synod this year than last. Last year 1,197 members were received into the churches; this year 1,542 were so received—875 by confession and 667 on certificate. We report 659 more members in our church this year than last. There are 522 more catechumens, and 829 more Sunday-school members enrolled this year than last year. In the important matter of benevolent contributions we find a falling off, and in this particular alone, but this is perhaps to be fully accounted for by the fact that the contributions of last year included those made for theology. An amount, however, of $3,774 18 less than last year was contributed by our churches for the benevolent operations of our denomination. But we note, on the other hand, a gratifying increase of $4,558 90 in the congregational contributions of the churches of Synod. On the whole it is evident that the reports, coming up from the various parts of our field, are of a character to fill us with devout thankfulness to God, and to inspire us with courage in our work.

Rev. Messrs. N. H. Dosker, P. Moerdyke, B. Van Ess and Wm. H. Phraner were elected, subject to the approval of the General Synod, as members of the Board of Superintendents of the Western Theological Seminary.

....OUR FOREIGN MISSIONS.—Drafts from the missions and all other expenses for the month of May have been paid without borrowing. The balance on hand this day is, in round numbers, $155.

For what are regarded the summer months, extending from June 1st to Sept. 30th, 1886, inclusive, $25,000 will be needed. The receipts last year, during the same months, were $13,000, being less than those of the summer of 1884. It is desirable that the wants of the coming summer be met by the receipts so far as possible, that borrowing and the payment of interest may be avoided. The Board has no information of legacies to be paid during the summer. The treasury will be dependent on the gifts of the living. How those gifts shall be made is referred to the judgment of each church.

The outlay, for which the Board is responsible through its appropriations, includes aid toward the support of village day schools, of academies for both sexes, and of theological classes; also toward church buildings, schoolhouses, and accommodations for seminaries and theological schools, and in making repairs; also to medical work in a hospital and dispensary; also more or less expenditure for printing and some outlay for work on Versions of the Scriptures, as well as the support of missionaries and the support in whole or in part of about two hundred native pastors, evangelists, teachers, etc.—who have been selected and trained with care. TREAS.

NEW YORK, May 21st, 1886.

A Misfortune.

THE following circular contains the facts, as they are officially made known, of the misfortune which has befallen the Board of Domestic Missions:

"Office of the BOARD OF DOMESTIC MISSIONS,
Synod Rooms, 34 Vesey Street,
New York, May 22d, 1886.

"DEAR FRIENDS: Our late Treasurer, John R. Smith, who had held the office for nearly twenty years, and enjoyed the unlimited confidence of the Reformed Church, has proved unfaithful to his trust. As Treasurer of the Board he has, without our knowledge, issued notes to the amount of nearly $25,000, and appropriated the money to his own use. For the payment of these notes we are bound. We do not deem it right to use our regular contributions from churches and other sources to meet the debt thus incurred. In our distress we appeal to our long tried and faithful friends. We earnestly solicit from you a special gift to aid in meeting the emergency of the case, so that the good work of our Board, now so encouraging, may go on without hindrance.

"Members of the Board have made and offered liberal subscriptions themselves. One has contributed $300. Two others have promised $500 each on condition that $10,000 be raised by July 4th next.

"We hope all our friends will promptly send a generous response.

"A full statement of the situation of the Board has been prepared and will be presented to the General Synod next week.

"Issued by order of the Board.

"J. WEST, Cor Sec."

....PHILADELPHIA, PA.—The Third Reformed Church, Broad street, below Poplar, had on Friday evening, May 14th, a meeting of rejoicing and thanksgiving for the happy termination of a contest involving the recognition of their organization. The Particular Synod of New Brunswick, in session at Jersey City, May 4-6, by a unanimous vote reversed the decision of the Classis of Philadelphia and fully recognized their church. Rev. Chilton Dean presided. After religious exercises addresses were made by Rev. C. F. C. Suckow, Rev. Mr. Taylor, Rev. D. M. Graham, D.D., Elders A. van Helden and Geo. F. Gordon, and Messrs. Thomas Cooper and Edw. B. Cooper. The music was led by Miss Jost and Miss Gruber.

At the close of the meeting all were invited upstairs, where two communicating rooms had been handsomely decorated with flags, flowers and evergreens, and two long tables were set, covered with flowers, ice cream, cake, fruit, etc. After partaking of a bountiful collation, a handsome gold-headed cane was presented to Mr. George F. Gordon as an expression of the appreciation of his earnest and tireless efforts for the congregation in the contest just closed.

In an adjoining room the children were gathered and refreshments given them, presenting a very pretty sight as they sat at the two long, low tables.

D.

The Theological Seminary at New Brunswick.

THE Board of Superintendents of the Theological Seminary at New Brunswick met in annual session in the James Suydam Hall, on Tuesday, May 18th, at 11 o'clock in the morning.

The several Classes and Synods were well represented. Rev. J. W. Beardslee, D.D., the retiring President, opened the meeting with prayer. Rev. David Cole, D.D., was chosen President, and Rev. Cornelius Brett, Clerk. In the deeply regretted absence of the Stated Clerk of the Board, Rev. P. D. Van Cleef, D.D., the Temporary Clerk was appointed Stated Clerk pro tem.

The report of the Standing Committee on Seminary Grounds and Property was received and transmitted to General Synod.

The report of the Professors shows that 23 students have been in attendance in the several Classes during the year.

The examinations were well sustained and showed a commendable attention to study in all departments. The sermons of the Senior class, delivered on Tuesday evening, were pronounced excellent, both in style of composition and delivery. The few advantages for vocal training have evidently been improved, and if the Department of Elocution were more liberally endowed, the Church would soon feel the benefit in the increased efficiency of her ministry.

A portion of the session was devoted to the consideration of the discouraging outlook for the future of the Seminary with regard to the number of students. The harvest is great, but laborers are few. The outlay for the support of the institution is out of all proportion to the few who enjoy its advantages. Earnest resolutions were adopted pressing these facts on the consideration of General Synod and of the Church.

The Commencement exercises were held in the First Reformed Church on Wednesday evening. The church was well filled by the many friends of the students and Seminary.

The Rev. Dr. Cole, the President, offered the opening prayer. The College Glee Club sang an anthem. The addresses by members of the graduating class were delivered by Mr. Albert Oltmans, of Grand Rapids, Mich., whose theme, an "Outlook upon Islam," was handled with ability; Mr. George Z. Collier, who spoke impressively upon "Literary Culture as an Aid to the Pulpit," and Mr. William I. Chamberlain, who gave interesting facts and statistics to show "God's Hand in Missions." Professor Demarest presented the class with the certificates of graduation, accompanying the act with words of wise counsel and hearty sympathy. The address on behalf of the Board was delivered by the Rev. Henry Ward, of New Hackensack, N. Y., and was a vigorous discussion of the means of obtaining certain knowledge, especially in the realm of religion. The President concluded the exercises with prayer and the benediction. All the addresses were of a high order, and the class going forth to enter upon the work of the Gospel ministry, gives promise of great usefulness for the future.

The following is the roll of the graduating class: Junius C. Ayler, Evert J. Blekkink, John H. Brandow, Wm. I. Chamberlain, George Z. Collier, Jacob Dyk, John Laubenheimer, John Morrison, Albert Oltmans, Robert V. Palmer, Evert W. Stapelkamp, David F. Williams. C. B.

Installations.

....SECOND CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA.—The installation of the Rev. William H. Clark, D.D., as pastor of this church took place on Tuesday evening, May 12th, in the presence of a large congregation. The President of the Classis of Philadelphia, Rev. W. R. Taylor, presided and read the form for the installation of pastors. The sermon was preached by the Rev. W. J. R. Taylor, D.D., of Newark, N. J., from Psalm 48: 2, "Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth is Mount Zion, on the sides of the North, the City of the great King." Subject, The Destiny of a Great City. The Rev. Samuel Streng, of Churchville, Pa., delivered the charge to the pastor; and the Rev. George S. Bishop, D D, of Orange, N. J., gave the charge to the congregation. The devotional services were rendered by the Rev. James I. Good, of the Reformed Church, United States, and the Rev. C. F. C. Suckow, both of Philadelphia. Beautiful floral decorations, elaborate music by the choir, hearty singing of the congregation, and the unabated attention of the people throughout the lengthened exercises of the evening, added greatly to the spirit of the occasion.

Dr. Clark has begun his ministry in this important church under very favorable auspices. His people have received him and his family with a warm welcome and are rallying to the work of the church with loyalty and earnestness. One fair token of their interest in their denominational relations is the fact that eighty-five copies of THE CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER are taken by as many subscribers among them.

....BRONXVILLE, N. Y.—The Rev. J. Joseph Rankin was installed by the Classis of Westchester as pastor of this church Tuesday evening, May 18th. In the absence of the President of Classis, the Stated Clerk, the Rev. C. K. Clearwater, presided, read the form of installation, and gave an apt and interesting charge to the people, basing his remarks on Acts 10: 33. The Rev. W. F. Anderson, of Fordham, N. Y., preached the sermon on "The Church as a Witness," and the Rev. Dr. Johnson, of New London, by invitation, delivered an excellent charge to the pastor. The Rev. E. J. Runk, a former pastor of the church, assisted in the exercises by reading of Scripture and prayer. The church was beautifully adorned around the pulpit with flowers. A new pipe organ has been secured, the choir protected with a new brass railing and crimson curtains, and the church interior otherwise improved. The church is to be congratulated on securing a pastor of Mr. Rankin's experience; and all will unite in wishing both pastor and people many years of happy and successful work. E. J. R.

....GERMAN EVANGELICAL CHURCH, HOBOKEN, N. J.—The Rev. John W. Freund was installed pastor of this church Thursday evening, May 13th. Though the weather was stormy, the church was well filled. The President of the Classis, Rev. P. V. Van Buskirk, presided and read the form for installation. The sermon was preached by Rev. I. W. Gowen. The Rev. C. D. F. Steinfuhrer charged the pastor, and Rev. John Justin the people. Dr. C. Klein, Prof. Seibert, Revs. Jacob Schlegel and George Seibert assisted in the services. After the benediction by the newly installed pastor, he received the congratulations of many present, and their hearty wishes that his labors might be greatly blessed. K.

....PASTORS' ASSOCIATION, N. Y., May 24th, 1886.—The Rev. Dr. J. M. Dickson, of New York, read a paper in favor of the Prohibition of the Liquor Traffic, and most of the members who spoke concurred in his conclusions. The Association resolved to omit the meeting and discussion set down for next Monday, May 31st, (that being the day to be observed as Decoration Day,) and adjourned to meet June 7th, when the Rev. Dr. G. H. Smyth will read a paper on "The Work of the Holy Spirit."

....THE 253D COMMENCEMENT of the School of the Collegiate Dutch Reformed Church will be held at De Witt Chapel, 160 W. 29 h street, on Thursday evening, May 27th, at 8 o'clock. The friends of the School and its Alumni are cordially invited to attend.

ROBERT SCHELL, Committee.
HENRY W. DUNSHEE, Principal.

....HOPE COLLEGE.—I have received for Hope College and transmitted to its Treasurer: From Mrs. M. Van Arsdale, New Brunswick, N. J, "an Easter offering," $7; Rev. James E. Bernart, $5.

I have also received from Mr. James E. Hedges, Elizabeth, N. J., to begin an endowment for a Professorship of English Language, History, and Rhetoric in Hope College, $100.

Now, friends, this ball is started quite unexpectedly. Who will help tokeep it rolling until $20,000 or $25,000 are in hand for so important a department of education? Let the money or pledges come in rapidly.

GILES H. MANDEVILLE.

SYNOD'S ROOMS, 34 Vesey Street, N. Y., May 12th, 1886.

....HACKENSACK, N. J.—On Sabbath morning, May 16th, the Rev. Herman Vanderwart early in the service expressed his thankfulness for the generous acts with which the congregation of the First Reformed Church had received him, and invited the Sabbath school to call at the parsonage on the succeeding Tuesday afternoon and the congregation to attend a reception in the evening. The commodious parsonage and grounds were thronged by the children in the afternoon, who were made very happy by the arrangements for their entertainment. The new pastor won their hearts by his participation in their amusements. In the evening the house was crowded by those who came to give a hearty welcome to the new pastor. Various articles of new furniture, selected by a committee and placed in the parsonage as an earnest of the good will of the future, were inspected and commended. The gathering, a very sociable and informal one, was much enjoyed by all present. The church is reported as filled every Sabbath with very attentive audiences. Mr. Vanderwart's installation was appointed for last evening.

...The Rev. Dr. Paul D. Van Cleef has continued to improve in every respect during the past week. Last Sabbath he was able to walk down to the parlor of his residence and out upon the back piazza. A decided gain in memory and speech has been acquired.

...HOLLAND, MICH.—The First Church held their first service in the basement of their new building Sunday before last.

....CASTLETON, N. Y.—Owing to the falling last December of a portion of the brick arch which supports the tower of the church, the building has been condemned, and the congregation now holds services in the Town Hall. A Building Committee has been appointed to secure plans for a new church to be erected on the site of the old one, which will soon be removed. The old edifice was erected in 1852. The present pastor is Rev. A. D. Campbell.

....A NOTABLE ANNIVERSARY. — The forty-ninth anniversary of the organization of the Woman's Auxiliary Foreign Missionary Society of the First Church of Glenville, N.Y., was appropriately celebrated, Wednesday, May 19th. Miss E. Gibson, once a missionary in India, and now engaged in temperance work in Albany, addressed in the afternoon a large audience of ladies upon the lamentable condition of the women of India, and the efforts made to reach them with the Gospel through female missionaries.

This interesting address was followed by the reading of an historical sketch, which showed that the Society had never failed to hold an annual meeting, and to make an annual contribution to the Missionary Board. A letter from Mrs. D. K. Bartlett was read, expressing her regrets because unable to fulfill her part in the programme, and also containing much good advice for the benefit of the Society. After adjournment an enjoyable collation was served in the chapel to visitors.

A general meeting was held in the evening, every pew in the church being fully occupied. An attractive feature of the service was an introduction to the audience by Miss Gibson of two young ladies arrayed in Hindo costumes, illustrative of her remarks. This was followed with earnest addresses by Rev. J. Gardner, of Gloversville, N. Y., and Rev. C. B. Perkins, of Amsterdam, N. Y., both of whom also spoke at the afternoon session. The celebration was a pronounced success, and made an impression that will be long felt.

...THE CLASSIS OF WISCONSIN met by special request at Roseland, Illinois, April 20th-22d, 1886. Rev. J. Broek, the retiring President, preached a sermon, 2 Tim. 1: 13. Rev. B. de Bey became President, Rev. J. Huizinga, Clerk pro tem. Nearly all the churches were properly represented. A call of the church at Philadelphia, Kansas, on the theological student, Mr. D. Scholten, was approved. As members of the Council of Hope College, instead of Rev. Messrs. J. H. Karsten and Wm. Moerdyke, who had accepted calls in other Classes, Rev. Messrs. B. van Ess and J. Broek were appointed. Both terms run to 1887. Rev. H. van der Ploeg was appointed a member of the Board of Superintendents of the Western Seminary.

After the Committee on the State of Religion had reported, the meeting was briefly and encouragingly addressed by Revs. J. Muller and J. W. Dunnewold. It was resolved to dismiss, at their request, Rev. W. Moerdyke to the First Church of Pella, Iowa, and Rev. L. Watermuelder to the Classis of Sheboygan of the Reformed Church in the United States. Rev. G. Zindler was received from the last-mentioned body, and arrangements were made, after a satisfactory examination and his signing the forms of faith, for his installation at Baileyville. It was also resolved to enter on the roll of Classis the church at Keener, Indiana, organized some time ago.

The following report of a committee was adopted:

Whereas, The Classis of Wisconsin has always been unanimous in condemning all secret and oath-bound societies, therefore,

Resolved, That the Classis again most earnestly express their disapproval of such societies, and that this resolution shall be entered in the minutes as a memorial of undiminished conviction.

The Committee to organize an English-speaking Church in Chicago reported that the time for this did not seem to be propitious. The same committee reported favorably for the organization of a Holland-speaking church at Englewood, near Chicago.

Classis appointed a committee to examine into the practicability of introducing the singing of hymns in the Holland speaking churches of the Classis.

Classis being invited to a ride to Pullman, accepted the invitation and went in a body to view the city which has sprung up in a day. The Classis was afterward entertained at the parsonage by the pastor and his wife. At another hour the Classis were photographed in front of the church by a young and enterprising photographer. Thus ended a very pleasant meeting, marked by genial unanimity and brotherly love. May its labors be followed by great blessings and glorious results. S. C.

Gleanings from our Exchanges.

...Rev. J. P. Searle, of Somerville, N. J., preached the sermon before the Somerset County Bible Society at its sixty-eighth anniversary on Tuesday, May 18th, in the Congregational Church, Bound Brook, N. J. His text was Deut. 11: 18-20. The sermon was a succinct, pointed statement of the uses to which the Word of God should be put. Rev. P. M. Doolittle, Chairman of the Executive Committee, reported that 202 Bibles had been withdrawn for distribution during the year. The Treasurer's report showed $995 56 paid in during the year, which had been remitted to the American Bible Society.

....Rev. Louis Goebel, pastor of the Third Church (German) of Hackensack, N. J, preached his fifth anniversary sermon to a large audience, Sunday, May 16th. On the next Monday evening the congregation held a special meeting to consider the question of enlarging the church, when it was decided to build a temporary structure in the rear of the church to accommodate the Sabbath-school. The money necessary to do this work is already in hand. It was also decided to start a building fund, with which to finally enlarge the church itself.

....The eighty-seventh anniversary of the Sabbath-school of the First Church of New Brunswick, N. J., took place Sunday afternoon, May 16 h. The attendance was very large, the capacious galleries as well as the main floor of the church being crowded. Dr. M. H Hutton and Rev. Eugene Booth assisted the Superintendent, V. M. W. Suydam, in the opening devotional exercises. Interesting addresses were delivered by Prof. J. G. Lansing of the Theological Seminary, and Rev. Hugh McCauley, of Bound Brook, N. J. The Secretary's report showed the membership of the school to be as follows: Main school, 240; Bible class, 25; officers, 10; teachers 43; intermediate department, 23; infant department, 202; total, 543 —an increase of 95 over last year. The large infant department is still under the faithful superintendance of Mrs. V. M. W. Suydam, who is efficiently assisted by Miss Lizzie Van Cleef, Miss Ella De Hart, and Miss Dora Buttler. Professor Mabon has a flourishing Bible class in the school. The total financial receipts, including a balance in the treasury at the beginning of the year of $332.94, are $1,028 82; the disbursements amount to $613 91, leaving a balance of $414 41. The school contributed $25 to each of the Mission Boards. It supports a native teacher in India.

...On Sunday, May 9th, the Rev. William J. Leggett, of Claverack, N. J, preached his fourth anniversary sermon. During his pastorate the congregation has removed a considerable debt, improved the church edifice inside and out, added a handsome addition to the lecture-room, and increased their contributions to missions. The church has five Sunday-schools in successful operation.

...JAPAN.—A summary of statistics just issued by one of the Christian newspapers gives the whole number of churches in Japan at this time as 151, the whole number of church members as 11,602, and the total contributions of the churches during the year yen 23,406 97, equal to $18,725.39. The increase on the previous year is 18 churches, 1,902 members, and yen 6,415.15 in contributions. J. L. A.

....AN AGED SAINT.—We called on Sunday afternoon with Bishop Warren on Miss Harrod, who was born in Newbury port, Mass., in 1786, and who, if she lives until next August, will be one hundred years old. The call was a delightful one. The venerable woman greeted us cordially, talked freely, recited a long Gospel ballad which, she said, "I learned ninety-two years ago, when I was eight years old." She became a Christian when she was fifteen. Her voice was strong, her enunciation distinct, and her faculties all perfect. The clear sunset is always beautiful, but in this case is especially so. The day has been a long one, the evening is not far away, and the rest will be pleasant.—Rev. Dr. Vincent, in Our Youth, May 1st.

....A very significant feature of temperance work in Worcester Mass., was presented in a very large mass meeting of Swedes at the Rink on Sunday afternoon, where they were addressed by several of their own pastors in Swedish, translated into earnest temperance doctrine.

A Modern Sir Galahad.

BY MARY R. BALDWIN.

CHAPTER VIII.

"My wife, my life, O we will walk this world Yoked in all exercise of noble end."

"I HAVE been wondering how my people would receive the news of my marriage," the bridegroom remarked to his bride as the train sped on towards Danton.

"Do you think they wished their minister to marry?" asked Miriam.

"Well, I really cannot tell. I never tried to discover their wishes in this respect. I think, however, they are a people to appreciate the service of a true woman in the great office. Their last minister's wife they seem to regard as having been nearly perfect." He was about to proceed with a history of the efficient woman's deeds, when a glance at the eyes of Miriam, the new minister's wife, made him suddenly question himself of its expediency.

"I hope," said the sweet, low voice of the bride, "that the church will not expect me to fill the place of such a wonderful woman."

"You are my sweet wife, given me of the Lord," answered Laurence, at that moment defying secretly even the church to form an adverse judgment upon the gentle, beautiful woman who was to honor it by her service.

The clear complexion betrayed the surging of the pure blood, in answer to the great flood of joy that sent to every vein its thrilling fulness.

The news of the minister's marriage came like a shock to Danton's church. There was no house among his flock where it was not discussed, more or less, and it must be confessed that there were stormy scenes in some homes; for to many it had seemed that their minister had failed to act with his characteristic sincerity towards them. Upon some the news fell with crushing weight to unspoken hopes.

Mrs. Holdridge presided at an indignation meeting in her own house. Mrs. Rev. Philetus Clark and Mrs. Deacon Ives, being of her mind that the minister had certainly acted unadvisedly in the matter. Jerusha, to the surprise of the three sisters, insisted that the minister should be as independent of his church in matters of the heart, as were they of him in their own particular love affairs. "The heart must answer its own bidding," she said, and, whilst her voice trembled, added: "I am more and more convinced that one wrongs his own soul when he allows opinions or customs to interfere with this God-given right."

The listeners looked in astonishment at the speaker, and then at each other. They felt the home thrust, but did not feel equal to a proper defence of themselves.

At last, Mrs. Holdridge replied: "Jerusha, I must say that I am not taken wholly by surprise by your words. I have for some time noticed that you were not quite yourself. It was a great mistake for you to go on that visiting committee. Some things have happened since that our family would have blushed at. You followed the young minister's advice in the matter, I am sure; you seemed to have a great regard for his opinion—and he seemed to have more than a common regard for you at one time."

"Mother, what can you mean!" cried the now thoroughly roused girl. "It is true that I followed the advice of Mr. Bowles, because I had learned through him the difference between Gospel service and the husks of tradition. Oh, if I had been taught it sooner I might not have made a life mistake. But henceforth, I mean to live truly, trying to help others to the joy which I have missed myself in failing to be true to my highest thought of truth, of duty and of privilege."

With these words she left the sisters to themselves.

When Mrs. Marshall received a letter from Laurence Bowles and learned through it of his marriage, it seemed to her that she never could have him come back as her boarder; but after thinking over the situation calmly, she began to see much that was palliative in it, and after due consideration, to even regard circumstances related to it as providential.

She felt that this was especially true of the going of Anise at just the time she did go—not a week earlier nor a week later. So, fortified by her pride, she was able to face Danton, and with firm voice to declare that she was glad the minister was married.

The night before the return of the minister was the one for the regular church prayer-meeting, and Squire Downs, who owned a large heart and a clear head, felt called upon to say a few words which were not after the regular exhortation order, but words which he felt were in the interest of his Master's kingdom. The burden of his exhortation was "the duty of the church to the coming wife of the minister." He pleaded with the assembled sisters to regard the young wife as a sister in the Lord, cautioned them about expecting too much of her, and advised them above all else to beware of their small talk about her. "You know, my friends," he said, "what a great matter a little fire kindleth; trouble in churches has begun so often with criticisms upon the minister's wife; let us be above such a record. And just one thing more; we must allow the new lady to be herself, not trying to force her to be somebody else. Let us close with singing 'Blest be the tie that binds.'"

The wise Squire used a little pious trick to engage the attention of the audience, and to give any rising resentment a chance to spend itself while they joined in the hymn which emphasized brotherly love.

The Sunday following the arrival of the minister with his bride was an eventful one. There was a full church and few late-comers—the minister with his wife being the last to enter, as the bell was giving its final call. If the fathers and mothers had wondered what the minister could possibly find elsewhere in feminine charms and womanly excellence that could compare with what Danton could furnish in these respects, they nevertheless were obliged to concede to their one sense at least—that the young bride whom the minister had chosen was very fair to behold. The young girls experienced a something which was not due solely to their admiration of the pure, refined face, and the lady-like bearing of the stranger. Perhaps they ought to be forgiven if envy had any share in it.

When the services began, all eyes were fastened upon the speaker; there was the earnest manner, the absorption of self by his theme, that had marked his service to his people before his marriage; and this fact, recognized by his people, saved him to his old influence over them, for if they had discovered any sign that the bride had encroached upon their rights, his usefulness would have been at an end in the church.

After Sunday had passed, the people came day by day through the afternoon and evening to pay their respects to the pastor's wife. Miriam, as we know, had not before marriage been given an opportunity to forecast with regard to a minister's wife's duties. In her moment for dreaming upon it she had only recognized the union of hearts upon a spiritual plane—a consecration of two souls to the Highest, without a thought of the details of service. And when the people came, and the husband explained to his wife, after their departure, their separate needs, she lifted asking, helpless eyes to Sir Galahad, who divined nothing of their expression, his thoughts were so absorbed with the affairs of these needful ones.

At last, when the minister's wife was no longer a novelty—a large share of the visiting ceased, and gave the tired wife a chance for a quiet hour; but she had suffered such a drain upon her energies, that she was for a time prostrated and unable to accompany her husband as he went his daily calling round. Squire Downs, loyal to his first conception of duty towards the new wife, said one morning: "Polly, what do you say to my hitching up Jane and going with the cutter down after the minister's wife? She looked like a snow-drop last Sunday, and if I'm any judge of human nature she's one that can't stand this everlasting clutching of the church people. Mrs. Marshall says her door knocker is wearing away with use, and I'm sure if iron can't stand it, flesh and blood can't; and the poor little snow-drop is likely to be sacrificed if we don't help her out of the crowd once in a while."

"But Mr. Bowles, I'm sure, husband, will not allow her to endure it longer than she can with safety; you know he is a very thoughtful man—wonderful with the sick, and afflicted, too—and, of course, he'll look out for his own wife," answered Mrs. Downs.

"That's just where you are wrong, Polly. If I am any judge of such men, I should say that they think a wife is a part of themselves, so far that she is to have a kind of partnership in their sacrifice. This is all well enough, you see, if it isn't carried too far. The fact is, Polly, both the minister and the young creature who is his wife, are as ignorant as babies of the world; they are on a spiritual mountain and the rest of us are down in the valley; they see us from their high ground and they don't know all the petty aims and desires that are of the earth, earthy. The minister thinks that all the cries of his people are for their soul's need, and he runs at every call and drags the poor little snow-drop with him, and if he could only be made to feel that these people need to be roused to a sense of personal responsibility. Well a church has a duty—a particular one to a young pastor, and I shall watch my chance to give our minister a word now and then."

"Oh, Abner! you don't mean that you would find the heart to reprove Mr. Bowles—wise and good as he is? But I've a mind, as you have proposed, to invite the minister's wife to come out for a day or two."

When the good Squire was met by the minister in the study, and the errand had been told, Laurence Bowles answered, "I am very thankful for the opportunity for my wife; it will refresh her and she will get stronger for the work we have to do; there is much to be done before the next communion; the candidates for admission to the church are to be seen separately each week, and my wife is a great help in this particular work."

"Every week? Won't their religion keep if it isn't looked after as often as that?" the Squire asked. Laurence Bowles opened his eyes with astonishment; he wondered if he had heard rightly. The Squire noticed the look and said, "I think, Mr. Bowles, if they would call upon the Lord more, and upon their minister less, it would be much better for them."

"You do not quite understand, Mr. Downs," answered Sir Galahad, "that great care is to be used with those little ones in Christ until they become rooted and grounded in the faith."

Squire Downs had something to answer which he thought was both reasonable in a worldly sense and also Scriptural, but the memory of "Polly's" words of an hour before warned him to say nothing further, and after a few more general remarks Mrs. Bowles came in dressed for her ride, and the Squire and the "snow-drop" were soon speeding fast towards the old farm-house which was to prove a haven of rest to the young wife.

Mrs. Downs was irresistibly drawn to the young, motherless creature who had, in pledging her life to the minister, become, in a sense, a sacrifice to his church. She meant to do all she could to make her forget what she owed to the church for at least one day; and she found the Squire a great help in this effort. He talked with the little lady about her parish duties, it is true, but his fresh, natural views of life and of the relation of one life to another brought her out of the morbid condition into which she had fallen by the unnatural demand that had been made upon her resources, mental and physical.

"Old Nancy Weld has been telling me what a world of good a sight of your face did her," the Squire broke out after a pause in the conversation. "And so, my dear Mrs. Bowles," added the kind man, "you must be careful and keep yourself well and cheerful if your face is going to help people. I think that is a mission of a good many people," he went on, "just keeping themselves pure and true before God—I mean of people who are not made for the crowd and not given to much talk, and to what some of us call church work. I really do think that much of our church work is just a running about, the result of restlessness. When one has the spirit of Christ in his heart he is sure to work for Him, whether he stretches out his purpose to new ways, or lives just as the flowers do, looking up and making another life brighter by being themselves—simply themselves. Now I know families in our church where the wife and mother has lost all her home power and influence by becoming possessed with the idea that she was elected to do especial church work. She is too tired to be anything in her home after one of her sewing-societies, and I say does dishonor to the cause of Christ by trying to be so much to outsiders and thinking too little of the home field."

The Squire in this, as in most of his conversations with his visitor, had a purpose. And he was rejoiced to find that his words were not without their effect upon her. And when he left her the next day at her own door and she bade him good-by, she said in her sweet, low voice, "Mr. Downs, my visit has helped me in many ways," he felt down in his heart thankful for the opportunity of service to such a tender lamb of Christ's fold. "I may be able to help the minister through her," he whispered to himself as he rode home in the winter's twilight.

The visits to the farm were many times repeated, and times of refreshing they always were, yet the church calls upon the minister and his wife did not grow fewer; and when in the spring, the minister, finding that it was the wish of his people that he should go to house-keeping in the parsonage, decided to establish a home for himself, many hands were offered for service, and day and night advisers came and went from the minister's study to the parsonage, until the thought of home-quiet, which had been the dream of the disheartened Miriam, was displaced by fear for the future. When at last the house was in order and the husband and wife sat for the first time alone at their own table, Laurence, with a look of pleasure in his face, remarked to the charming lady opposite, "My dear, this surely is delightful! Our people have been very kind, very kind to do everything for us."

Miriam was annoyed that she herself could not regard the "help" just as her husband did. She had been so rasped by the inharmonious arrangements, which to one of her sense of fitness were almost unbearable. She had tried to be thankful, had prayed for an especial gift of grace, but she could not shut her eyes to the fact that the color of the window shades quarrelled with the shade of the carpet, and that of the carpet with the furniture, and she despised herself that she could not assert her will so far as to command her instincts to obey her wish. Poor Miriam! the strain upon her, mentally and physically, was too great, and Sir Galahad's eyes were still drawn above.

Inspiration of the Hebrew Vowel-Points.

BY GEORGE S. BISHOP, D.D.

Part II. Objections.

BEFORE discussing the question of the inspiration of the Vowel-points, some space we spare to plausible objections which we think admit of solid answer.

I. Massoreth Ha Massoreth.

1. Levitas' great argument in Massoreth Ha Massoreth is, that the Talmud says nothing about the Points; an omission certainly surprising were it true—but that it is not true is abundantly shown by Glassius, Buxtorf and Owen, who quote from the Jerusalem Megillah, the Babylonian Megillah and Nedarim to the contrary.

Again: Mishnitic documents older than the Talmud cited by Rabbi Azarias and Rabbi Joseph del Medico contain them.

Once more: Aben Ezra says that the Hebrew text, as we have it, was restored by the order of God through the inspired labors of Ezra, assisted by the men of the Great Synagogue. He says this restoration was especially effected by the help of the vowels, which he divides into kings and ministers, and of which he gives a list. Of kings he enumerates seven: Hholem, Shurek, Hhirek, Patach, Seghol, Kamets and Tsere; and of ministers Sheva and its compounds. According to Aben Ezra then, the vowels existed 1,000 years at least before the Massorites. According to universal tradition they existed from Moses.

The Kabbalah (Sohar I.; 15, b.) asserts that "the Vowel-points proceeded from the same Holy Spirit who indited the sacred Scriptures," and that "far be the thought to say that the Scribes made the Points, since even if all the prophets had been as great as Moses, who received the law direct from Sinai, they could not have had the authority to alter the smallest Point in a single letter, though it were the most insignificant in the whole Bible."

2. Levitas' second argument is, that the ordinary synagogue rolls are now, and therefore were always, without vowels; but this is an open non sequitur. No man can prove that the rolls were without the vowels at first. And even if this could be proved, the fact that the common rolls—for it is not a question of the Great Temple Rolls—were written without points, admits an easy explanation.

One thing: The difficulty of accurately transcribing innumerable little points of various shapes would naturally lead to the production of short hand copies for common uses.

Again: Ten copies could thus be made in the time required for making one copy, a saving both of labor and expense. A singular confirmation of this argument was found in the setting up of the twelve Hebrew words occurring in the former article. The consonants were set up in five minutes—to put in the vowels required an additional hour.

Once more: There was an inducement to the omission of the Points; for thus the Rabbis would be left at liberty to interpolate oral traditions in their explanation of the text. And this is not obscurely hinted by our Saviour when He says, "Ye make the Word of God of none effect by your traditions."

And finally, the ruling principle to keep authority and power. If only the Rabbins knew the real Points, preserved by the Great Temple MSS., the people would be more at their mercy. The Scribes and Pharisees would sit more solidly in Moses' seat. In other words, the same influences wrought in the Pharisaic church which are germane to human nature, which are conspicuous in the working of the church of Rome to-day, and which were never voiced more arrogantly than by that great bulwark of the papacy, Morinus, who does not hesitate to assert "that the reason why God ordained the Scriptures to be written in this ambiguous manner (i. e., without the Points), is because it is His will that every man should be subject to the judgment of the Church, and not to interpret the Bible in his own way. For seeing that the reading of the Bible is so difficult, and so liable to various ambiguities from the very nature of the thing, it is plain that it is not the will of God that everyone should rashly and irreverently take upon himself to explain it: nor to suffer the common people to expound it at their pleasure; but that in those things, as in other matters respecting religion, it is His will that the people should depend upon the priests."

II. The Silence of Jerome. The objection is made from Jerome that not only did he himself omit the Vowel-points, but that he is everywhere silent about them. This would be significant in the case of a church father living when Jerome lived, (A.D. 340–420), and holding the position he held as a translator and expounder of Scripture. The objection may be met, however, and we think is met, in these among other replies:

1. Jerome omitted the Points, just as Hebrew scholars now omit them, for brevity's sake and not because they were not on the original parchments. We might as well argue, from an unpointed Hebrew Psalter of to-day, that the editor knew nothing of the Points, as to argue thus of Jerome.

2. The pointing of the Hebrew in the works of Jerome throws the burden of proof upon those who deny that he wrote them. We have a right to insist that, as there are Points to his Hebrew words, they always were there and that he put them there; and this we shall insist upon until it shall be shown why not.

3. If Jerome put in the Points and had them before him, why should he speak of them, since they were taken for granted? Why should I speak about the "a," or "i," or "o" that I am writing now?

4. Jerome does speak of the Vowels. He speaks of them in his Epistle to Evagrius, (Ep. 126,) where he says, "Whether the word should be Salem or Salim matters not, since the Hebrews rarely write the Vowels in the middle of a word." But if they "rarely" wrote them, certainly they wrote them; and Jerome, by his saying this, shows that he knew that they wrote them and knew what they were.

5. But more than this; Jerome actually comments on the different meanings of the same word when written with different vowels. For example, he tells us that Dabar (with two kametses) signifies "a word," but Deber (with two seghols) signifies "the plague." So with the words Bamah, Bameh and others. But such observations as these turn on the very exactness as well as existence and knowledge of the Points.

To sum up the whole argument in words condensed from Dr. Gill: "Jerome probably wrote the Points, and copyists, for brevity or with a purpose, omitted them in the transcription. That Jerome did know and use Vowel-points is clear from the fact that he often makes his argument turn on a word, the force of which lies in the vowels, and which cannot be distinguished from another very diverse word, without them. Beside all this, Jerome gives us the Hebrew in Latin letters with exactly the same correspondent vowels, which shows that he knew them and used them. In one place, too, he speaks of the 'prick' or point on the word kumah, which he calls the pointing; besides, he makes many observations upon other words which show his knowledge of the Points, as in Ps. 90: 8, where he comments on alumenu, which he translates 'our neglects,' and wonders how the Septuagint could have translated it 'our age,' as if it were olamenu. How could he write like this, if the Hebrew, which he had before him, had no Points?"

Objections being thus removed, we come to the climax of the conclusion; for the statement of which no words will ever be found more truthful, more discriminating, more forcibly to the purpose than those of Dr. Lightfoot, in his masterly response to Walton's Prolegomenon. "There are some," he says, "who believe the Holy Bible was pointed by the wise men of Tiberias. I do not wonder at the impudence of the Jews who invented the story, but I wonder at the credulity of Christians who applaud it. Recollect, I pray you, the names of the Rabbins of Tiberias from the first foundation of its University down to the day it expired. What, at length, do you find there, but a kind of men more mad than Pharisees, bewitching with traditions and bewitched, blind, crafty, raging—pardon me, if I say magical, monstrous? Men how unfit for so divine a work! Read over the Jerusalem Talmud and see there how R. Judah, R. Chaninah, R. Judan, R. Hoshaia, R. Chija Rabba and the rest of the grand Massorites behave themselves. How earnestly they do nothing; how childishly they handle serious disputes, how much froth, venom, smoke—pure nothing in their disputations. Then if you can believe the pointing of the Bible came from such a school, believe also their Talmuds. The pointing of the Bible savors of the work of God the Holy Ghost, and not of that of lost and blinded and besotted men!"

The inspiration of the Vowel-points thus shown and vindicated, is a matter of no secondary and no trivial importance—since the controversy will always go back to the Points, and the establishment of the Points will always be the establishment of the Church doctrine of exact, direct, chirographical inspiration, and not only this but also the establishment of one straight, permanent, authoritative, changeless text; and this Dr. Ginsburg himself, while opposing that text, as he does the Vowel-points, most readily admits.

"The rejection of the Points," he says, "by men of laxer tendency, following Levita, produced most lamentable effects, especially so far as the criticism of the O. T. is concerned"—effects, indeed, from which we have not yet recovered, but which, in spite of all the resistance of a sound and a loyal conservatism, are still seen working themselves out in the popular, so called, "Higher Criticism" of the day.

"It was," says Dr. Ginsburg, "the unwarrantable liberty taken with the text, first started by Capellus, following in the wake of Levita, and the resort to all sorts of emendations and conjectural readings in order to sustain the peculiar and preconceived fancies of different individuals and schools, which converted the controversy about the Vowel points into an Article of Faith in the Reformed Church of Switzerland, and led to the enacting of a law in 1678, that no person should be licensed to preach the Gospel in the churches unless he publicly declared that he believes in the integrity of the Hebrew text and in the Divinity of the Vowel-points and accents."

But more than this, the vindication of the Vowel-points is the vindication—as authoritative—of that one received and ancient Hebrew text, agreed to universally by Jews as well as Christians, as the closest and indeed the only reproduction of the Archetypal Norm. No discoveries, hereafter to be made, can shake it. Nothing we have now can dispute it. The quest of restless men who go "searching the world for a better text than the Massoretic" is certain to be disappointed. There is no better, and irreverent audacity will only toil to find itself confronted by those words of solemn disapproval and of judgment with which John Owen ends up the ancient discussion: "Whoso breaketh down a hedge, a serpent shall bite him."

The Primal Text stands firm. To it all other texts must bow—to it the so-called "Superlinear"—to it the Versions,—even the Septuagint, quotations from which, made by our Lord and His Apostles, no more prove its inspiration than quotations from Menander and from Epimenides, made by St. Paul, prove the writings of those men to be inspired.

....The American Home Missionary Society and several auxiliaries are now employing some eighteen Scandinavian missionaries. These are in Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Missouri, Texas, and Washington Territory. The number of Scandinavians in some parts of our country is well illustrated by the following remarkable facts: In one densely populated district in Minneapolis, within a radius of five blocks there are thirteen houses of worship, in only one of which is the English language spoken, and eleven of them are Scandinavian, and most of them are full to overflowing at every service, although at least three of them will hold fifteen hundred people each. —The Moravian.

....The average number of copies of the Scriptures issued daily by the British and Foreign Bible Society and the American Bible Society during the year 1885 is about 18,240.

....“Griggs's Philosopical Series” is the most valuable philosophical publication for popular purposes which has appeared in this country. It is not a mere translation or republication of the great German masters, but a “critical exposition.” That is to say, it does better than render them into English,—it renders them, so far as possible, into the modes of thought and speech of intelligent people who are neither by mental constitution nor training specialists in metaphysics. They might, in fact, be called paraphrases, or mental translations. The previous volumes, of Schelling, Fichte, Hegel and Kant have been written by Professors Watson, Everett, Kedney and Morris in an almost ideal manner. The latest of the series is “KANT'S ETHICS,” by President Porter of Yale College. The name of the latter is a sufficient guarantee, both of the intellectual comprehension of the subject, and the lucidity of the style and treatment. The scope of the work will be understood from the Contents, which consist of an Introduction, chiefly explanatory of the relation of Kant's ethical teaching to his metaphysics, and to modern thought; a chapter giving an account of his principal ethical treatises; a chapter devoted to expounding the fundamental principles of the “Metaphysics of Morals,” and another concerning the “Critique of Practical Reason;” a chapter giving a critical summary of Kant's ethical theory; and, lastly, some critical notices of Kant by Schiller, Lotze, Julius Muller and others. (S. C. Griggs & Co.)

....“EXPOSITIONS.” By the Rev. Samuel Cox D.D. Second Series. Dr. Cox is a man of acuteness and learning, and withal master of a clear, simple and vigorous style. It is not much wonder, therefore, that the first series of these “Expositions” has gone to a third edition, and the second meets with a cordial reception. The author avoids commonplace and often brings unexpected treasures out of familiar passages. Sometimes, however, he is the victim of his own ingenuity. For instance, from the famous passage in Deuteronomy, “the word is nigh thee,” etc., which is quoted by Paul in the tenth chapter of Romans, instead of deducing the obvious lesson that the way of salvation as revealed is easy and accessible, he gets the totally different and erroneous doctrine that we are to “test all we hear of God by the facts of our own moral consciousness.” So that, while the discourses are certainly expository, they often expound not what is in the Scripture, but what lies in the moral consciousness of the expositor. The book, therefore, is to be commended with a strong caveat. Dr. Cox provokes thought and is full of suggestiveness, but he often makes light of fundamental truth and says what is sure to mislead unwary readers. (T. Whittaker.)

....“FROM ACCADIA TO MACHPELAH; or, the Homes and Journeyings of Abraham.” By Rev. James Marshall Thompson. The story of the eventful life of the great patriarch is retold in this book with a freshness and vigor which will doubtless give it, to unscholarly readers at least, all the interest of a new story.

The author has aimed to popularize the valuable results of modern Oriental research, and by a skilful use of such facts as throw light upon the life and times of Abraham has succeeded in presenting a realistic view of the man, his country, his homes, and the events of his life. His work has been carefully and satisfactorily done, and may be commended as both interesting and instructive. (Pres. Board of Publication.)

....“THE MARRIAGE RING.” By T. De Witt Talmage, D.D. This volume embraces a series of fifteen sermons recently delivered in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. The subjects are treated in a very outspoken, energetic, and, of course, original manner. From this bold preacher, noted for his marked individuality, we expect only that which is original and striking. Always unsparing in denunciation of wrong and surpassed by none in zeal for the right, we are not surprised to find in these discourses some very plain truths told in a very plain way. We are inclined to the belief that in a few instances he has taken a position so extreme as to be hardly justifiable. The book is suitably and beautifully bound. (Funk & Wagnalls.)

....“LET IT ALONE AND IT WON'T HURT YOU.” By Edward Carswell. The title of this book plainly indicates its design. It is intended to exhibit—and it does so with great vividness—the sorrow and suffering which intoxicating drink brings to those who let it alone through the indulgence of those who will not let it alone. If the arguments and facts are not especially novel, they are, at all events, presented with so much earnestness and attractiveness and in so striking a way, that they can hardly fail to be effective. (Nat. Temperance Soc.)

....“THE BOSTONIANS.” A Novel. By Henry James. This fascinating story was first published in the Century about a year ago, and as it was unfolded in the successive numbers of that magazine, attracted much attention and received many favorable comments. It shows the talented author at his best as a novel writer. The characters and scenes are chiefly of Boston; and by the author's graphic pen-pictures the reader obtains a pretty good idea of social life in that city. As exhibiting local peculiarities, the work is instructive; it is also made very entertaining by a plentiful sprinkling of humorous and amusing incidents. (Macmillan & Co.)

....The American Tract Society sells a dainty book, with a neat white paper cover, tied with blue silk ribbon, entitled “THE KEY THAT OPENS THE DAY.” The margins are set off by red lines. It is designed for private devotion. Two pages are devoted to each day in the month; the first contains suitable selections of poetry, followed by a Scripture text, and the second is occupied with reflections, which are excellent. It is a pretty souvenir.

....“TALKS WITH MY BOYS.” By William A. Mowry, Ph.D. These chapters, full of mature counsel, are to be commended not only to boys but also to teachers as models of a wise, sensible and attractive presentation of such moral questions as may appropriately be enforced by the teacher of a secular school. Strong sense, clearness, logical power together with moral force characterize all these “talks,” and furthermore, they are told in a very entertaining way. (Roberts Bros.)

....“A DESPERATE CHANCE.” By J. D. Jerrold Kelley. This is a tragic story, a story of sin and retribution. It is well written and exciting, but is not pleasant reading, and for the summer rest in the hammock or the easy chair we should prefer something more cheerful. (Scribners.)

....“RUHAINAH: A Story of Afghan Life.” By Evan Stanton. This novel appeals to the interest excited by recent events in English diplomacy pertaining to Afghanistan and adjacent countries, and aims to give a portraiture of Afghan society and character. The story is novel in plot and local color, and strongly written. (Cassell & Co.)

....“A POPULAR TREATISE ON BAPTISM,” by Rev. J. J. Leberman, A.M., is a clear, comprehensive and soundly reasoned discussion of “What is baptism?” “Who is to be baptized?’ and “How are we to be baptized?” The positions taken and maintained are those common to our Church and other pedo-Baptist communions. It will be found useful as a practical and brief compend of the subject. (Reformed Publishing Company, Dayton, Ohio.)

....“PERSIA: THE LAND OF THE IMAMS,” by Rev. James Bassett, a Presbyterian missionary, is published by Charles Scribner's Sons and not by Harper and Brothers, as was stated on this page last week.

....“FORGOTTEN MEANINGS; OR, AN HOUR WITH A DICTIONARY,” by Alfred Waites, is an interesting collection of words whose etymology when understood embalms history or incident. It is both a guide and a stimulant to the further study of words. (Lee & Shepard.)

....Eight numbers of the “Sacred Selections,” containing from two to five pages of music and words for use on Decoration Day are received. The music is not difficult and is pleasing; the verses are elevated and appropriate. A devotional and patriotic spirit prevails throughout the compositions. The pieces cost from five to ten cents. (Oliver Ditson & Co.)

Periodicals, Serials and Notes.

....The Atlantic for June is full of interesting reading. Three serial stories are now to be found in its pages, and a reader finds it difficult to carry them all in thought. Besides these we have a capital sketch of the second Pliny under the title “A Roman Gentleman under the Empire,” with his famous letters to Trajan, referring to the early Christians. “A Glimpse at 1786,” by Edward Stanwood, will satisfy all optimists that our world advances. George F. Parsons gives a very full account of Balzac and his wonderful work, and this is followed by a careful contrast of “James, Crawford, and Howells.” The Contributors' Club has but two themes, and rather falls below the average

....The Pulpit Treasury for May has a portrait and sketch of Bishop Foss of the Methodist Church, a sermon of his on “The Four Gospels: Their Differences and Their Essence,” and a view of St. James Methodist Church of this city. An interesting sketch is also given of “George Muller as an Evangelist.” The usual departments—Sermonic, Missionary, Prayer-meeting, Sunday-school and Editorial—are admirably sustained.

....In the Homiletic Review for May Principal Sir William Dawson, LL.D., treats of the “Present Status of the Darwinian Theory of Evolution” in a clear and discriminating paper; and H. J. Van Dyke, Jr., D.D., suggests “How the Ministry May Increase its Efficiency and Usefulness.” The contributions to the several Symposiums are ably handled and worthy of thoughtful study, notably that by Dr. T. W. Chambers on “The Effect of Modern Criticism upon Essential Doctrines.” It is an interesting and highly creditable number.

....Whatever may be laid aside in our home to be read at a more convenient season, The Pansy and Our Little Ones and The Nursery always receive immediate attention from all ages. If there are better stories for children, and for grown people too, than those in The Pansy, printed anywhere, we do not see them. Pansy, and Faye Huntington, and Margaret Sidney, and Paranete are always sure of a cordial welcome in our house. As to Our Little Ones and The Nursery we have only to record our settled conviction that it is a model in its class. It is a charming magazine for the little people; the engravings are beautiful, often exquisite, the verses delightful, and the stories from child-life and of animals and birds and all manner of living creatures are told with admirable skill.

....A Family Doctor, who has written much and well, has never written more to the purpose than for the June number of Cassell's Family Magazine, where he repeats the sound counsel given to a young man who stood before him, “pale, weary, woe-begone, and his voice having that irritable peevish ring in it, which speaks of debility of the whole system.” Thousands, we hope, will read the paper. The Cruise of the “Spindrift,” is a chapter on cuttle-fish with much of science and legend woven in. Goss and Sons is a wholesome story in two chapters. Hon. P. Carteret Hill, late Premier of Nova Scotia, writes sympathetically of Mr. Froude's “Oceana,” and the publishers insert a portrait of Mr. Froude—the first we have seen. The Bodleian Library of Oxford is described by pen and pencil very acceptably. These are a few of the attractions of the number.

....The Magazine of Art for June will be much enjoyed and the pleasure it affords is refined pleasure. The frontispiece, an engraving of Mr. John Constable's painting, The Hay-Wain, is a beautiful copy of quiet English scenery. Although she has not the first place in the magazine a noble lady is entitled to a first place in this notice. Three pictures, by her imperial highness the Crown Princess of Germany—an Italian scene, a symbolic composition, and a portrait—appear in engravings, accompanied by an historical and commendatory article by Mr. Alfred St. Johnston. The quaint beauty of old Guilford is presented in eight illustrations, and is very agreeably described by the Rev. W. J. Loftie. Alice Meynell sketches the career of Alexandre Cabanel and the text is enriched with engravings of characteristic works of the artist. A spirited full page picture copies faithfully a painting by Heinrich Lang of Driving Horses in Hungary.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT SOAP.

We think that an experience of 80 years entitles us to speak with intelligence and authority on the subject of soap.

Our business was established in New York City in 1806, and we still occupy the same premises. It is now the oldest firm of its kind in New York, if not in the United States.

We have for many years supplied a very large number of the oldest and best families of this city with our Laundry Soap. Many of these families have used no other soap for generations. They are people who can appreciate and will have only the best of everything. We probably have more of this class of trade than any other house in the United States. The reason of this is that we have always tried to furnish the best and most economical soap that could be produced.

The soap we speak of has been so long and thoroughly tested, and has given such universal satisfaction, that we have now decided to introduce it throughout the country generally.

When we first began business, adulterated soaps were unknown. Soaps differed in quality, according to the quality of stock of which they were made, but they were all pure—and no one thought of putting in soap anything but tallow, rosin, and enough alkali to form a perfect combination. Of late years, however, the demand for labor-saving and cheap soaps has led to the adulteration of this, as well as of so many other necessary articles. To such an extent is this practised that it is now difficult for families to buy a really good article of soap.

No soap can be made to save labor and sell at a low price without containing sal-soda, strong alkali, and other ingredients which injure and rapidly wear out clothing, bed and table linen, etc. This is one of the principal reasons that has led us to introduce an unadulterated, old-fashioned "LAUNDRY" SOAP. As this soap differs from other styles, we mention some of its

MERITS and PECULIARITIES.

1st.—It is absolutely pure, not a grain or atom of adulteration in it; and contains nothing that is not necessary to a perfect soap.

2d.—Because it is pure it does not as a matter of fact wash away more slowly, and will do more work than other soaps. This has been demonstrated by numerous tests.

3d.—While it will not save "time" and "labor," it will save many dollars' worth of clothes, acting as it does as a preservative, and not as a destroyer of the linen washed with it.

4th.—It contains no sal-soda, no silicate, no filling of any sort, nor any strong chemicals that can possibly injure the clothing or skin, and can therefore safely be used as a toilet soap.

5th.—Considering its absolute purity and unequalled quality, it is positively the cheapest soap any consumer rich or poor can buy.

6th.—It is made only of those materials which, when combined, make the best laundry soap, regardless of the appearance of the soap itself. It is therefore not the most attractive looking of soaps, but the very best for use.

7th.—After 80 years' experience we cannot manufacture or recommend a better soap for all laundry purposes.

1st.—When confined in boxes it has a peculiar tendency to "sweat" or become moist. This is owing to the absence of those chemicals which, while making soap dry, greatly injure the clothing. For this reason the soap is not wrapped. Expose the soap to the air and it will dry rapidly and become very hard.

2d.—It will warp, shrink, and twist with age. Its appearance is also somewhat mottled and streaked. These conditions are unavoidable in a pure soap. By adding sal-soda or other materials the soap can be made lighter in color and will retain its shape and also present a more handsome and brilliant appearance, but all these beautifying additions injure the clothing.

3d.—While it washes quickly and thoroughly it will not remove dirt in as rapid a manner as the "labor-saving" and "time-saving" soaps or powders. This is because it contains no excessively strong acids or alkalies which, while they remove the dirt easily and quickly, at the same time eat into and rot the clothing.

4th.—It appears to be an expensive soap when compared with other cakes of the same size. This is because only the best and purest materials that money can purchase are used in its composition, and nothing is added that can injure the clothing in the slightest degree.

We guarantee the truth of these statements, which are in no respect exaggerated or used for advertising effect. The object of making this soap is to furnish families with as perfect a soap as can be made, and one that they can feel assured is absolutely pure and cannot injure the clothing.

AUNT MARJORIE'S CORNER.

A Domestic Problem.

"MY love," it is David Copperfield speaking to his little wife Dora, "it is very painful to me to think that our want of system and management involves not only ourselves, which we have got used to, but other people."

"You have been silent for a long time, and now you are going to be cross!" is the reply of Dora, the inconsequent.

The poor, young husband, as we all remember, was behaving with an almost heavenly patience; so, disclaiming the remotest intention of being cross, he proceeded to define his position.

"It is not merely, my pet, that we lose money and comfort and even temper sometimes, by not learning to be more careful, but that we incur the serious responsibility of spoiling everyone who comes into our service, or has any dealings with us," etc.

And then it was that the pretty, spoiled baby in a burst of tears declared that she never had expected to hear her husband accuse her of stealing gold watches! If any reader has forgotten the inimitable scene, I recommend that she refresh her memory by a glance at the book.

Arguments of this serious nature, however infrequent, are not pleasant between husbands and wives. No wife enjoys being treated as if she were a child needing reproof, and if, like Dora, she undeniably is a child, not in the least grown up intellectually, she resents the counsel which sounds so much like reprimand all the more keenly that it is so clearly deserved. Scolding, however gentle, is never agreeable, and the husband or wife is unfortunate who finds a resort to it necessary, for it takes amiability, self-control, and the rarest fortitude to endure it with tranquility. When either, as to tact, intelligence and good humor, is very much the inferior of the other, the case becomes complicated.

Poor Dora is perhaps a trifle exaggerated, yet her like for imbecility is not unknown, and the type is not invariably softened by the attributes of beauty and sweetness which pertained to Dickens' "Little Blossom."

There are women, (and men, the latter usually unmarried,) who find a certain fascination in the ideal of childish dependence as the crowning grace of womanhood. Fortunately it is no longer fashionable to affect an idiotic incapability of taking care of one's self, or a distressing timidity in the presence of a pet aversion. It was once considered charming to faint at the sight of a mouse, and bewitching to stand as though paralyzed with fright at an encounter with a peaceful-looking cow. Bellona herself could not be more awe-inspiring to some nerves than a spider, and as for more substantial terrors, such as the burglar in the closet, or the alarm of a fire in the night, there were neither adjectives nor interjections enough in the language to serve the turn of agonized feminity thus confounded. Yet even now one meets occasionally a grown woman who wears the naiveté of sixteen, with a conscious coyness which at forty looks the absurdity it plainly is, who dissolves into tears at an abrupt word, and is forever looking out for slights.

The middle-aged housewife is sometimes discovered who deplores the ignorance of which she is evidently proud. That a newly married wife, as yet scarcely familiar with her house and its plenishings, still pleased with her new utensils as a child with her toys, should boast that she cannot keep accounts, that she has not the art of managing servants, or that she cannot cook a dinner, is excusable in a degree, since youth and inexperience are the complements of each other.

But the same confession when one has "kept house" for the changing summers and winters of a decade is simply disgraceful. At a luncheon party not long ago where ladies were the only guests, the conversation turned on the subject of good management or the reverse, and different bills of fare were discussed. One of the ladies mentioned an acquaintance who had reduced the trouble of cooking to a minimum. "She buys ten pounds of sugar and ten pounds of oatmeal at a time, and her milkman leaves the milk she orders every day, and that is everything which comes within her doors. If her husband is tired of oatmeal porridge, he can go to a restaurant, and so, for that matter, can she go herself."

Aunt Marjorie recalled from the dim corners of her memory the record of a company tea, of which she heard from a truthful witness and guest, and which consisted only of crackers, peaches au naturel and cold water, the hostess believing in plain living and high thinking; but there the balance of favor lay rather with the frugal hostess than with the skimping wife, whose diet of oatmeal solely was enough to alienate the affections of the most devoted husband. Dora Copperfield, poor child, did better than this,—her trouble lying in the direction of silly waste rather than in that of selfish shirking.

There is nothing so abstruse in good housekeeping that it cannot be mastered by an ordinarily clever woman. And there is no science on earth in which it is so impossible ever to graduate. The cast-iron way of living is not the best, and she who has inherited a set of rules from her mother or grandmother, and steadfastly sets her face to live up to them, with a "hitherto shalt thou come and no farther" opposed to their every infringement, is happily obsolete in these days. We recollect Mrs. Tulliver and her quiet complacency in doing everything according to the Dodson rules, and most of us know people who are not to be moved from their belief that nothing in the world equals their receipt for plum pudding, and that nobody's clear soup can possibly be as clear as their own. Then, we know other people who are superior to formulas, regarding cookery-books with lofty scorn, so infallible in their view, is that unknown quantity, their own judgment.

For each of these classes we have respect, although we may smile at the idea that they will ever find a place among good housekeepers. She who has already learned everything, and she to whom nothing can be taught, may alike boil and bake and brew after a fashion, but it will not be the fashion of the superlative. It is of the essence of excellence that it can take pains, that it shall be willing to give up something good for something better, that it shall not disdain exactness nor ignore the most approved methods. Anybody who is docile, willing to take trouble and open to conviction, may be a good housekeeper, even a notable one. Whether she has an innate fondness for the processes of housewifery and a feminine pride in the manifest results makes very little difference, so far as ability is concerned.

When, like Dora, one is not only averse to system and management, but has not the brains to apply herself to them, the affair is almost hopeless. For such a state of things is not likely to be ameliorated with time. Far back in my childhood I was told, as of an awful example, of a lady who allowed her husband to keep house. He, poor man, used to come from business, not like other men to rest under his own vine and fig-tree, but to make the puddings, mix the bread, and cut out the children's aprons. Finally, the pretty wife, she was said to be pretty, and she was said, too, to have been fond of novels and of her piano, was taken ill and died. And, with portentous severity, it was added, that when Mr. —— wooed his second wife he sought among the daughters of the land for one who could herself cut out aprons and compound puddings, although her musical knowledge was slight and her reading, for aught the gossips knew, was confined to the Bible and the newspapers. The moral of which is simply this, that whatever a man may honestly think and say to the contrary, one of the prime essentials of life with him is that he shall be taken good care of at home. Gail Hamilton, with her usual crispness, asserts that the reason servants always get on with less friction in the absence of the mistress, is, that so long as a man is fed and starched comfortably, he sees nothing of which to complain. There is a partial truth here. The most inexacting of husbands has a right to complaint if he is never sure of a decent meal, decently served, and if the ordinary and simple requirements which his wardrobe demands, such as buttons, tapes, etc., are neglected. Let the wife be as learned as a professor, as beautiful as Hebe, she ought still to know something of the primitive arts on which comfortable home life depends.

System and management! They simplify everything and they are not impossible of attainment, though in escaping the Scylla of haphazardness there is danger of dashing against the Charybdis of rigid slavery. A system should be one's servant, not one's master. Until American women learn to apply to their housekeeping the methods on which a merchant relies to carry on his business, they will flounder in misery like poor little Dora.

And as for expecting a peasant woman from some foreign country, alien in religion, untrained, slow of brain, heavy of foot, clumsy of hand, to enter your kitchen, and straightway bring to pass such order therein as you are yourself incapable of, it is not to be anticipated. Good servants imply competence in the mistress, and the woman who confesses that she never is free from the plague of unfaithful domestics, writes herself down as unfaithful. AUNT MARJORIE.

Little Men and Little Women.

AFTER all, men and women are only grown-up children, and we often see people who have reached mature years behave very much as do our own little nursery folks. These men or women show plainly, by their lack of self control and of judgment, by their selfish ways and peevishness, and by numerous other traits, the fact that their early training was sadly neglected. Of course it is not easy to enumerate, even, all of the points at which a child's character needs watching, but one or two may be mentioned; and, first, let us look out for that fault called selfishness. I suppose all of us, from Eve's first-born down through the ages since, have had, to a greater or less extent, this to battle with. It appears in so many forms that it is sometimes not recognized, but is called by some other and less disagreeable name. There is the child who refuses to share cake, fruit, or toys with his sister, who will not allow another to look at his toys or his books. This little one we all know, and this form of selfishness is usually struggled with by father, mother, and relations generally because, for one thing, it makes a child appear in so bad a light to others, and none of us like our children to be disliked. Then there is another child who will share his good things or his toys with any one, and who is therefore thought to be a model of unselfishness, and yet that same child will spend half his time in teasing and fretting some other little one, with no end in view except his own selfish amusement. Who has not seen him slyly, and in evident delight, knock down the tower of blocks or the sand-house which his little brother was building, and laugh in glee when he had kicked over the rolling hoop or broken the kite-string? This child is usually reproved, if at all, in the lightest possible manner, and the adoring mother often laughs at what she considers his smart devices for worrying his playmates and amusing himself. "He can't help teasing, it is born in him," is what is often said as excuse when one child has in this way spoiled a whole morning's play for another. This is a far more deplorable phase of selfishness than the first, because it causes the child to gratify himself at the expense of the rights and feelings of others, and this of itself leads to all sorts of evils.

Then there is that form of selfishness which manifests itself in the strife after the easiest chair, the cosiest corner, the biggest apple, and so on almost without end. Do let us keep a good lookout for this many-sided fault.

Next comes rudeness—that entire lack of courtesy which is so common among children, and particularly among those who are members of a large family. This may be in a great measure corrected by the mother. Insist that they shall speak pleasantly to each other; require Susie to say "If you please" to Tom, and Tom to say "Thank you" to Susie, and keep it up through the entire list. It is a troublesome task, and often it seems that, no matter how great the effort made, the result is failure; but patience and perseverance accomplish, if not all, certainly most things, and the result is worth striving for.—L. L., in Babyhood.

...."GEORGE ELIOT AND HER HEROINES." A study by Abba Goold Woolson. This is a thoughtful and interesting "study." The author does full justice to the abilities of Mrs. Cross, yet recognizes her limitations. She points out the despondent tone of her novels and traces it to its cause, her false view of life and her denial of immortality and of God. The "religion of humanity," however earnest and sincere, must needs be disappointing and feeble, for only few minds could find it adequate to the soul's needs and even they lack the inspiration of hope, but a religion which recognizes the great Father of all and enforces the duties of the present life by the assurance of another, not only points to a large and generous philanthropy but constrains to its exercise. Mrs. Woolson shows the connection between Geo. Eliot's religious views and the fearful error that clouded her life. (Harpers.)

....Two very pretty books for young folks are "DICK, THE CAPTAIN," and "NAN, THE MISSIONARY," by the author of "The Win and Wear Series." They are the first two of six volumes which are to give the lives of the boys and girls who composed the Gillette family, and who severally illustrated the virtues of integrity, unselfishness, perseverance, enterprise, faithfulness, honesty. We recommend them to those who wish to find good Sunday afternoon reading for their children. (Robert Carter & Bros.)

CHILDREN'S PORTFOLIO.

Loveliness.

ONCE I knew a little girl,
Very plain;
You might try her hair to curl,
All in vain;
On her cheek no tint of rose
Paled and blushed, or sought repose;
She was plain.

But the thoughts that through her brain
Came and went,
As a recompense for pain,
Angels sent;
So full many a beauteous thing,
In her young soul blossoming,
Gave content.

Every thought was full of grace,
Pure and true;
And in time the homely face
Lovelier grew;
With a heavenly radiance bright,
From the soul's reflected light
Shining through.

So I tell you, little child,
Plain or poor,
If your thoughts are undefiled,
You are sure
Of the loveliness of worth;—
And this beauty not of earth
Will endure.

—Marie Locey, in St. Nicholas.

A King's Son.

BY ELA THOMAS.

A Sketch in Two Parts.

PART II.

IN November, 1605, occurred the famous Gunpowder Plot, by which certain Roman Catholics who hated James hoped to blow up the king, prince and Parliament together. The discovery of this plot and the knowledge of the dreadful death from which he had been saved deeply affected Prince Henry, who was a boy of strong religious feeling; and after this he never allowed anything to keep him from hearing a sermon every Tuesday, the day of the week on which the Gunpowder Plot was to have been carried out. It was his habit, also, to go apart three times a day to pray quietly by himself. He had, above all things, a horror of profane swearing.

Prince Henry was keenly interested in all foreign countries, their politics and customs. Among the letters that were written to the prince, and which are still preserved, is one from Robert Tindal, at one time his gunner, dated "Jamestown in Virginia," 1607, together with a journal of his voyage and a map of the James river. We can imagine the interest the princely boy must have taken in this wonderful New World for which, had he lived, he might have done so much. Sir Walter Raleigh was one of his close friends, and though unable to obtain his release from the Tower where he was now imprisoned, the prince frequently visited him there to listen to the narrative of his adventures and, as he grew older, to take council with him on all matters of war and seamanship. Henry was especially interested in the condition and welfare of the British Navy. When he was ten years old, Lord High Admiral Howard had a little ship twenty-eight feet long built for him—a most delightful possession for a boy. From this time his interest in the navy grew keen. He studied about ships and shipping, visited dockyards and watched the building of a splendid vessel that the king had given him, and which he named "Prince Royal."

In January, 1610, Prince Henry gave a grand banquet to his father at St. James' Palace, where he now kept his separate Court. His sister, the Princess Elizabeth, helped him do the honors of the banquet, and distributed the prizes won at the tilting match which had preceded. These were trinkets garnished with diamonds. After the banquet the prince and his sister went to a comedy, and when they returned a gorgeous supper had been set, with crystal dishes filled with sweetmeats, fountains of rosewater, wind mills, soldiers on horseback, etc. Prince Henry led his sister twice around the table to see these marvels, and then they departed, leaving the company to enjoy them.

This same year he was created Prince of Wales, an occasion of great display; processions of barges on the river, tilting matches, banquets, splendid dresses and a grand ceremony, when, in the presence of a grand company, Henry Frederick was declared Prince of Great Britain and Wales. Robed in purple velvet, tall, well-made and gallant, he knelt before the king and received the crown, the sword, the ring, the gold rod, that had belonged to the rulers of Wales. Some years before he had been created Duke of Cornwall, but these imposing titles brought to the boy of sixteen, as his father had warned him, only cares and heavy burdens. He managed his great estates well and wisely, saw that his tenants were comfortable and contented, and greatly improved the value of his land.

Yet a shadow was coming over this bright young life. In matters of health the prince was sadly imprudent; among other things, going swimming in the Thames after supper. He had been warned against this practice, but disregarded the warning. When already far from well there was much hard riding; a grand entertainment to his father, who, with his Court, was on a great progress at his new manor of Woodstock, and then preparations for the coming of the young Elector Palatine, to whom, though only sixteen, the Princess Elizabeth was to be married. But Prince Henry never saw the wedding of his loved sister. Soon after the arrival of the Elector he was seized with a burning fever, and though the doctors did all they could, (which in that day was little enough,) he grew steadily worse, and on the 5th of November, the anniversary of the Gunpowder Plot, his trusted friend, the Archbishop of Canterbury, told him of his extreme danger, and asked him if he should die, "Whether he was well pleased to submit himself to the will of God?" To which the prince replied, "With all his heart." God's will was death, and a little later, as he lay dying and past speaking, the Archbishop asked him as a sign of his faith and hope in the blessed resurrection to raise his hand. He responded by lifting both hands. Thus Prince Henry left his earthly inheritance for the heavenly kingdom.

It is sad to read of the selfishness and indifference of the king, who came but once to see his dying son, and then, fearing the fever might be contagious, went away without seeing him. It is sad, too, to know that the Princess Elizabeth was kept from him for the same reason. She vainly sought admission, coming disguised in the evening to the palace in the vain hope of gaining access to the loved and loving brother who asked for her constantly, almost his last words being, "Where is my dear sister?"

Still, Henry Frederick had no lack of mourners. The whole English nation sorrowed for their gallant prince, and on the day of his funeral crowds of weeping people thronged the streets through which passed the great procession. In it were banners carried by nobles, horses draped in black, peers of England and Scotland, and officers of State, who preceded the solemn funeral-car.

It was a life as brilliant as prosperity could make, but we question if it held much real happiness. With all his splendid palaces, the prince seems from babyhood to have known almost nothing of home life or home love, save at the brief intervals his sister spent with him. At an age when most lads have no thought beyond those of boyhood, Prince Henry was burdened with the cares and responsibilities of his exalted position. What won for him the love of England, and what wins our admiration today, was his truth and honor and manliness. Amid the temptations of a corrupt Court and flattering courtiers, he kept himself pure. He was loyal to his trust in God, and faithful to his every duty. He bore his part in life bravely, and met death with true Christian courage. These qualities made Henry Frederick, Prince of Wales, a fit example for any boy, be he the heir of a king or the son of a beggar.

A Brave Boy.

IF we had lived when Graham of Claverhouse was scouring Scotland in search of the brave Covenanters, that he might drag them to prison or death for the great crime of reading the Bible, or meeting for prayer or praise, one day we might have seen walking leisurely along, a young Scotch laddie. He has a book in his hand, and his steps move slowly on as he is absorbed in its contents. But hark! what is that sound of clattering hoofs and clash of armor? It is a band of that dreaded soldiery in search for the rebels, so-called. Soon they are up with the boy. "What is that you have in your hand?" demands the leader of the troop. "It's the Bible," come from the firm young lips. "Thraw it in that ditch," savagely shouts the fierce captain. "I wunna." "Thraw it in that ditch," I say. "I wunna," says the pale-faced yet firm young soldier of Christ, clasping his precious treasure yet closer to his bosom, while the soldiery gaze on, and the brutal captain, fierce with rage at being thus defied by a "wee braw laddie," hisses out, "If ye dinna thraw it in yon ditch, I'll shoot ye!"

But Jesus Christ is with the boy, as with quiet trust and determination not to abuse his beloved Book, he stands true as steel to his Saviour and Lord; and though death is staring him in the face, simply replies, "I canna, wunna!"

"Fire, men!" shouts the infuriated leader; and the soft heather receives the warm life-blood of the youthful martyr, as he falls to the earth, pierced by the bullets of his cruel murderers.

No Claverhouse rides over the land now, it is true, to seek by brutality and force to stamp out the Word of God, but there are plenty of school-fellows to sneer at those who are "good," or "set themselves up to be better than other people," and it sometimes takes more courage to stand a taunt or a curl of the lip than it does to bear a blow.

Let no one force you to give up your Bible-reading, or what is better still your Bible living. He hath said, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee;" so that we may boldly say, "The Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me."—H. Hankinson.

Recognition of Favors.

GRATITUDE is a grace by far too rarely found. The story of the lepers in a book which reveals not only more of the Divine nature, but more of human nature, than any other, represents the usual sad disproportion of gratitude in the world. The lepers were peculiar in the misfortune of leprosy, but not peculiar in the other misfortune of ingratitude. Every feeling grows by expression; hence we should strive to increase our appreciation of favors by every possible acknowledgment of them. Yet a great many favors are habitually accepted by us as a matter of course, and if not entirely unacknowledged, are very carelessly and indifferently received.

A domestic said once, in speaking of a deceased mistress with respect and affection, "It was a pleasure to do anything for her, for whatever it was, great or small, she always had a bright smile, and a hearty 'Thank you.'"

"Why do you suppose Madam B—— has so many friends?" asked a young girl about an aged lady who received a great many visits and tokens of remembrance. "Everybody seems to like her."

"I can give you one reason," answered her aunt; "she is always grateful for every kindness, and shows that she appreciates even the slightest favor,—a flower, the loan of a book, whatever it may be,—by a prompt and heartfelt recognition of any attention, any personal thoughtfulness on the part of others."—Ex.

My Brother's Portrait.

Lines for Decoration Day.

BY GEORGE W. BUNGAY.

THAT'S a portrait of my brother; he fell
At Gettysburg, in a harsh storm of shell
And iron hail on that terrible day
When the valley rang with the cannon's knell,
And fire fell upon the blue and the gray.

He was tall and straight and handsome, you see,
Hair black as a raven's feather, and we Thought that his eyes of a beautiful brown
Looked through the dim veil of futurity
Into the realm of the throne and the crown.

When the smoke of the battle was lifted high,
Like a curtain drawn by hands from the sky,
We sought for him amid heaps of the slain;
But we never found him though we were nigh
The spot where he fell in the fiery rain.

Nor stake nor stone mark the grave where he sleeps;
The dumb earth around, the sad secret keeps;
But he will arise on the judgment day,
When the soft white wing of the angel sweeps
Over the camp's silent couches of clay.

He was but a mere youth, just past nineteen;
The handsomest lad of the village green;
The pet of his parents and sisters dear,
And brothers brave, on whose hearts he would lean
In his blithe boyhood, when danger was near.

Oh how we miss him at the fireside bright;
When the winds wail on a bleak wintry night;
And in summer and autumn, when the red stain
On the leaves and flowers in the golden light,
Is as red as the brave blood of the slain.

Here in the old homestead is a vacant chair,
And our mother looks in vain for him there;
And sometimes in her fitful sleep she seems
To see him descending a starry stair
Like an angel on the ladder of dreams.

Memorial Resolutions.

GAMALIEL G. SMITH.

AT a regular meeting, held on May 12th, the Board of Foreign Missions of the Reformed Church in America adopted the following minute:

The Board has heard with great sorrow the announcement of the death of its Treasurer, Gamaliel G. Smith, which occurred on Friday, April 30th, in the 73d year of his age. He was elected to the office in October, 1862, and during the period of nearly twenty-four years has performed its duties with eminent faithfulness; indeed, no one could have been more faithful. We recall to-day that the period has been one of such trial in the financial management of Christian foreign missions as had not been before experienced in their history in this country. The high premium on gold and exchange during the Civil War and for some years after, the severe financial losses and difficulties succeeding the general prostration of trade in 1873, and continuing through five years, made the position of Treasurer a most trying and burdensome one. During this period Mr. Smith remained steadfastly at his post, sustaining the work by his personal credit and earnest solicitations and by liberal gifts. This credit was frequently interposed between the Board and the most serious embarrassment. And this has been done without salary in any form—has been a wholly gratuitous service. This faithfulness was produced by a settled belief in the Word of God, a spirit of obedience to the last command of our Lord and Saviour, and a deep and abiding interest in the souls of the heathen, and a prevailing desire for the extension of the kingdom of God on the earth.

We also record our high estimate of his consistent and earnest piety, refined, strengthened and made more beautiful in the last years of his life, by the ministry of the grace of God, as he passed through the severe affliction of the loss of his only son and the suffering incident to frequent returns of painful sickness.

C. L. WELLS, Recording Secretary.

REV. S. P. LIVINGSTON, D.D.

The following action was taken by the Council of Hope College at its meeting April 29, 1886:

Since it has pleased God in His inscrutable Providence to remove by death the Rev. E. P. Livingston, D.D., one of the oldest members of this Council, therefore,

Resolved, That we hereby give expression to our high appreciation of the character and ability of our brother, whose decease we have been called to mourn. As the Church has in his death lost another of its earnest laborers in the ministry, so the Council sustains therein the loss of one of its wisest counsellors. Always ready to serve the interests of the Institution, as well as of the Church, with cheerfulness, we feel that we shall hereafter greatly miss his pleasing company, mature judgment and wise counsel.

Resolved, further, that we humbly bow to the will of God in this Providence, that, notwithstanding the darkness of His dealings in removing men whose services seem so indispensable, still we know that all His ways are wise and good; hence we desire to submit to the wisdom of the Master in calling our brother to his heavenly reward.

It is also our earnest prayer that this sudden departure may make us feel more deeply the importance of this life, which may so soon be cut short.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the bereaved family, and that they also be published in THE CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER.

P. MOERDYKE, Secretary.

Battery Park Song Service.

THE Park Commissioners have again granted the use of the music stand, Battery Park, to the Rev. C. C. Goss for a service of sacred song on Sunday afternoons at 3 o'clock; Mr. C. M. Fisher, precentor and organist. The services will open on Sunday next, May 30th, and will be preceded by a rehearsal on the previous Thursday evening at the lecture room of the Presbyterian Church, 54 West 15th street, to be followed by other rehearsals at the same time and place.

The General Outlook.

....The General Conference of the Southern Methodist Church adopts action looking toward a union again with the Northern Church.

....The Presbyterian General Assembly is in session in Minneapolis, Minn. The Rev. Dr. E. R. Craven, Retiring Moderator, preaches a grand sermon on "The Saviour's Reward." The Board of Foreign Missions reports a debt on May 1st of $57,853. The Assembly resolves to unite its three missionary periodicals in one. The Freedmen's Board reports $113,913 receipts of year, of which $17,000 was from the freedmen, 12 new churches organized and 1,453 members added.

....The anniversaries of the Baptist Societies began yesterday afternoon at Asbury Park, N. J., with the 9th annual meeting of its Woman's Home Mission Society, to be followed by the 72d of the American Baptist Missionary Society, the 54th of the Home Mission Society, and the 62d of the Publication Society.

....The Congress of Churches begins its second annual meeting to-day at Cleveland, Ohio. Governor Foraker is to preside. Bishop Gilmour, Romanist, is to take part in the discussion on religion in the public schools.

....The Mercersburg Classis of the Reformed Church in the United States, at its spring meeting, held at Upton, Penn., adopted the overture presented last year requesting the General Synod to adopt measures to bring about a closer union between the branches of the great Reformed family of churches.

Financial.

TUESDAY, May 25th.

THE bank statement of last week shows loans reduced $5,205,100 and deposits $2,534,400; specie increased $14,500 and legal tenders $656,000, and $1,304,100 added to the surplus of reserve, making it $13,801,175. The figures in full are: Loans $342,129,200, specie $69,819,000, legal tenders $35,403,700, deposits $365,686,100, and circulation $7,870,000. Money was loaned freely on call at 1 1-2 to 2 per cent. Yesterday these rates continued with the exception of a short-lived flurry which raised the rate to 7 per cent. Boston reports the clearances of last week to have been in thirty cities $783,385,306, against $704,223,609 last year, an increase of 11 1-10 per cent. Outside of New York the gain was 19 8-10 per cent, and in New York 8 9-10. The largest gain was in the West. Trade, therefore, is larger this year than last, notwithstanding the strikes.

The Stock Market, after a very dull week, revived somewhat yesterday afternoon, with a moderate reaction toward the closing hour. The railroad bond market was active and firm.

The foreign grain markets were reported quiet yesterday, but without change in prices. Here the market fluctuated yesterday, but had a tendency to firmness and strength. The week's report of the visible supply of wheat is expected to show a decrease of about $2,500,000 bushels; last week showed about an equal diminution. Quotations yesterday were for June grain: Wheat here 87, in Chicago 76; corn here 45 5-8, in Chicago 35 5-8; oats here 35 1-2, in Chicago 27 1-2. The provision market has been declining since May 1st. Pork for which $9.35 was then bid in Chicago, now brings only $8.60, and the bids for lard have fallen from $6.07 to $5.95. The report from Liverpool in regard to provisions is, "in poor demand," pretty much all around. The closing quotations for cotton yesterday were: May 9.16-17; June 9.16-17; July 9.26-27; Aug. 9.35-36; Sept. 9.19-20. Under a full supply and declining demand hay and straw began to decline while we were writing last week. Prices yesterday were: Choice Timothy 85 to 90, No. 1, 80 to 85, clover mixed 65 to 67; No. 1 rye straw 90 to 92, oat 40 to 50, and wheat 40 to 50.

Imports of merchandise at this port last week amounted to $8,060,369, and exports to $6,680,009. The export of wheat increased. The specie export last week was $113,189. Sterling exchange yesterday sold for $4.87 for 60 day bills and $4.89 1-2 for demand.

China Straw Mattings.

We take pleasure in directing the attention of our readers to the advertisement of Messrs. H. P. Williams & Co., 250 Canal street, N. Y. This long-established and well-known firm is noted for carrying an enormous stock of China Straw Mattings—said to be the largest amount controlled by any one house in the United States. The variety of styles embraced in this great lot of mattings should suit all tastes and the prices, ranging from $4 per roll of 40 yards upwards, we know to be low.

The First Sign

Of failing health, whether in the form of Night Sweats and Nervousness, or in a sense of General Weariness and Loss of Appetite, should suggest the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This preparation is most effective for giving tone and strength to the enfeebled system, promoting the digestion and assimilation of food, restoring the nervous forces to their normal condition, and for purifying, enriching, and vitalizing the blood.

Failing Health.

Ten years ago my health began to fail. I was troubled with a distressing Cough, Night Sweats, Weakness, and Nervousness. I tried various remedies prescribed by different physicians, but became so weak that I could not go up stairs without stopping to rest. My friends recommended me to try Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which I did, and I am now as healthy and strong as ever.—Mrs. E. L. Williams, Alexandria, Minn.

I have used Ayer's Sarsaparilla, in my family, for Scrofula, and know, if it is taken faithfully, that it will thoroughly eradicate this terrible disease. I have also prescribed it as a tonic, as well as an alterative, and must say that I honestly believe it to be the best blood medicine ever compounded.—W. F. Fowler, D. D. S., M. D., Greenville, Tenn.

Dyspepsia Cured.

It would be impossible for me to describe what I suffered from Indigestion and Headache up to the time I began taking Ayer's Sarsaparilla. I was under the care of various physicians and tried a great many kinds of medicines, but never obtained more than temporary relief. After taking Ayer's Sarsaparilla for a short time, my headache disappeared, and my stomach performed its duties more perfectly. To-day my health is completely restored.—Mary Harley, Springfield, Mass.

I have been greatly benefited by the prompt use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It tones and invigorates the system, regulates the action of the digestive and assimilative organs, and vitalizes the blood. It is, without doubt, the most reliable blood purifier yet discovered.—H. D. Johnson, 383 Atlantic ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

NATURE'S CURE FOR CONSTIPATION,

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT

Sick-Headache, AND DYSPEPSIA.

Thousands of Dollars are spent to secure the sanitary condition of our dwellings, but thousands neglect their own bodies by allowing a sluggish action of the bowels to become chronic. Chronic Constipation means the storage in the body of a mass of decomposing material, generating foul gases, which penetrate every part of the system, and utterly unfit the sufferer to take part in the battle of life.

Tarrant's Effervescent Seltzer Aperient expels all waste matter from the system, acts gently on the skin and all the excretory organs. It never fails to cure Constipation, Biliousness, Sick Headache and Dyspepsia. It is pleasant to the taste, certain in its action, economical in price, and should be found in every household and carried by all travelers.

Be Joyful All Ye Near and Far.

(From the German of Paul Gerhard.)

BE joyful, all ye near and far,
That late were so down-hearted!
Ascends from night life's Morning Star,
Death's awful portals parted.
He comes, He comes, who late with blood
Did battle for the sinner's good,
And death, by dying, thwarted.

Thou thoughtest, O thou savage foe,
The Prince of Life all glorious
Within the tomb thou hadst laid low,
O'er Him and us victorious;
Thy sting is broken, cruel Death,
He lives, He breathes immortal breath;
Our Captain goes before us.

Ah! yes, from sleep He lifts His head;
Thy bands, O Death, are broken:
Through gate and bar He's quickly sped,
And wears the victor's token.
Where is thy trusted armor now?
Where is the crown that decked thy brow?
Fulfilled His word late spoken!

Thy boasted might, O Death, is gone,
No hurt comes to man dying!
He leans th' unfailing arm upon,
On that support relying:
"I live, I live, who once was dead,
In peace on Me repose thy head,
To all thy wants replying.

"For Death himself has power no more,
From Me he cannot sever;
I am of death the conqueror,
Rejoice! I live forever.
Henceforth, in Me, their living Head,
My members live who once were dead,
In spite of hell's endeavor.

"The battle, yes, with hell, is mine,
The victory, I have won it!
The eye in death can see life's sign;
The Cross and Him upon it!
And while the Tempter still has room
A little while to fret and fume,
His kingdom, I've undone it."

Now, God be praised, the day is ours!
No victory could be greater,
And scattered are th' infernal powers,
Again God is Creator!
From death's dark chaos comes forth life
And peace from battle-field and strife,
Through Christ, the Mediator!

—J. E. Rankin, D.D., in The Watchman.

The Power of the Cross.

OUR eyes were arrested the other day by a rude wood-cut of our Saviour hanging on the cross. It was in a dingy little shop on a cross street in the poorest part of New York. As we paused to look at it a moment, we could not but think what a power there was, after all, in the story of the cross. Why did we pause to look at that poor wood cut? It was not artistic; it was not beautiful; it was not anything especially pleasing to the eye. The power was in the story it told; in the thoughts which it suggested; in the assurances it brought to the heart. It told us that God had come near to speak to us; that God loves us and has put away sin; that through that awful death on the cross a pathway to life and immortality was being cast up over the ruined highway of death. In that rude picture we could feel the heart-beat of God for us sinful men, and it was a beautiful sight to us. It told the same story as does the masterpiece of Rubens. Indeed, we are not sure that it did not speak more directly to us than the painting of the great artist, for in that picture we had more of the thought of the artist, while in this there was nothing but the vision of the Saviour.

A friend was with us at the time, and we remarked to him the strange fascination and power which the cross of Christ exerted in the world, in spite of all the infidelity and open sin and disregard of Christ which apparently existed. "Yes," was his reply, "and no one knows what a mighty power Christ has upon one's heart and mind until he makes the attempt to live without Him, or tries to dismiss Him from one's life." We do not know, but we fancy this friend had at one time been tempted to solve the problem of life apart from Christ. We were reminded of an incident which we once heard which illustrated the truth of our friend's remark, even in the case of those who are apparently the most reckless in their disregard of Christ and his Gospel.

A crowd of men, some old and some young, were assembled one winter evening in the bar-room of a country tavern. The conversation had turned to the consideration, or rather the discussion, of a present religious interest in the village. One young man, more outspoken in his infidelity than the others, made the following declaration:

"For my part, I would sell out all the interest I have or may ever expect to have in Jesus Christ for five dollars."

"Do you mean that, young man?" said an old farmer who was present.

"Certainly I mean it," was the response.

"Then," said the farmer, pulling out his wallet and taking a five dollar bill from it, "I will buy your interest. Here is your five dollars; now you come and sign a paper to the effect that you resign all your present and future interest in Jesus Christ and His Gospel."

The young man took the money and stepped up to the bar and began to write, while the rest looked on in amazement:

"I, A. B., do hereby sell and forever part with all the interest which I may now have, or might ever have hoped to have, in Jesus Christ, for the sum of ——." Here his hand faltered; he hesitated a moment, and threw down the pen and the money, and said: "No, I won't do it; I was only fooling."

Alas! how many men are "fooling" with their souls, and trifling with God in their boasted infidelity, when the truth is, that, back of all their unbelief, Jesus Christ has a mighty hold upon their religious judgment. Their infidelity is not of their heads, but of their hearts. They do not believe in Jesus Christ, because their hearts are corrupt with the love of sin or with a pride of self-righteousness. Yet bring them to the point and they would not bind themselves to an absolute parting with all their prospective interests in Christ. But what awful sin, what base ingratitude, what unspeakable presumption is that which will allow them to make a mock of Christ, and utterly disregard His claims, while at the same time they are reserving to themselves the thought that when their extremity comes they will turn to Him for life.—Words and Weapons.

International Sunday-School Lesson.

BY REV. JOHN C. VAN DEVENTER.

June 6th.—"Jesus the Bread of Life."—John 6: 22-40.

Golden Text.—"Lord, evermore give us this bread."—JOHN 6: 34.

CENTRAL TRUTH.—"Blessed are they that do hunger and thirst after righteousness."—MATT. 5: 6.

INTRODUCTION.

THE feeding of the multitude had so worked upon the carnal hopes of the people in connection with the Messiah that they had been roused to a high pitch of enthusiasm. They were looking for political deliverance not only, but peace and prosperity, ease and luxury. The teachings of Jesus at this crisis were admirably suited to the state of feeling described, and resulted in sifting the number of His followers so that only very few were left.

THE LESSON.

I. THE MEAT WHICH PERISHETH.—VS. 22-27.

V. 22.—"The day following, when the people, which stood on the other side of the sea." It seems probable that many of the company that had gathered on the preceding day had dispersed in the late evening, so that only a portion of those who had witnessed the miracle were still remaining on that side of the sea. "Saw that Jesus went not with his disciples into the boat." They were not aware of the retirement of Jesus into the mountain, nor of the manner in which He had joined the disciples. They supposed that He must be still in their neighborhood, and so were expecting to see Him again at any moment.

V. 23.—"Howbeit there came other boats from Tiberias." These boats probably arrived within hailing distance while the people were seeking for Jesus, and wondering as to His whereabouts. The statement is introduced here in order to explain the manner in which the people crossed the sea to Capernaum.

V. 24.—"When the people therefore saw that Jesus was not there." They had probably been searching the neighborhood for Him, and were now convinced that He had really departed. "Came to Capernaum, seeking for Jesus." They may have expected to anticipate His arrival, and so be ready for the next step in His wonderful course.

V. 25.—"When they found him on the other side of the sea." At Capernaum and probably in the Synagogue. "They said unto him, Rabbi, when camest thou hither." They knew that the time for travel between the departure of the disciples and their own sailing had been too short to admit of a land journey around the head of the lake, and evidently recognized something miraculous in the sudden appearance of Him whom they sought.

V. 26.—"Ye seek me, not because ye saw the miracles, but because ye did eat of the loaves and were filled." Jesus probes their motives and shows them to be of the very lowest type. To have followed him because they had seen the miracles would have been bad enough, but to be prompted simply by the fact that their bodily appetites had been gratified was indicative of purely carnal feelings and motives. The word translated "filled" gives peculiar emphasis to this reproach, for it literally means gorged like a dumb brute.

V. 27.—"Labor not for the meat which perisheth." Their thoughts and energies were taken up with the anxious question, What shall we eat and what shall we drink? For them the life was merely meat and raiment. "But for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life." There were deeper wants to be satisfied, of which these people were not conscious; richer blessings to be sought, for which they had no desire. "Which the Son of man shall give unto you." The meat which perisheth was to be gained by the sweat of the brow, the meat which endureth was to be had for the asking. The title, Son of Man, was frequently used by Jesus when speaking of Himself "Him hath God the Father sealed." The commission of Jesus was abundantly accredited by His person, character and words, as well as by the repeated signs or miracles that He wrought.

II. THE WORKS OF GOD.—VS. 28-33.

V. 28.—"What shall we do that we might work the works of God?" It is difficult to imagine what the exact meaning of this question is, and this difficulty is probably due to the fact that those asking it did not understand it themselves. It appears to have been half curious and half serious, but was taken advantage of by Jesus to give fuller instruction to these people.

V. 29.—"This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent." In this answer Jesus contrasts works with work;—multitudinous technicalities with one all-controlling principle. He also contrasts the works of self-righteousness with the faith of helpless penitence.

V. 30.—"What sign showest thou then.... what dost thou work?" The frequency with which this demand for a sign occurs in the Gospel in the face of all the miracles therein recorded illustrates the truth that the men of that day having eyes saw not. The effect of the miracles was not to awaken faith but to arouse wonder and curiosity. In their own minds these people were comparing Jesus with Moses, and to the disparagement of the former.

V. 31.—"He gave them bread from heaven to eat." The supply of manna was regarded by the Rabbis as the chief of miracles. They looked upon Moses as the agent in this supply of daily bread, and they considered the manna itself as something heavenly in it nature as well as origin. Until Jesus should giv them something better than barley bread, and more abundant than a single meal they would not prefer Him to Moses.

V. 32.—Jesus condescends to meet their objections in order to bring the truth to their attention. "Moses gave you not that bread from heaven." The fact is, that according to the narrative from the hand of Moses, he had nothing whatever to do with this supply of food beyond making known the law concerning it. It was not even given in answer to his intercession for the people. This manna, while appearing in a supernatural manner, was not a heavenly bread. It was material and met simply physical necessities.

V. 33.—"The bread of God is he which cometh down from heaven and giveth life unto the world." In the Revision this statement is made in more general terms,—"The bread of God is that which cometh down"—Jesus is leading up to the more explicit and personal declaration of verse 35.

III. THE BREAD OF LIFE.—VS. 34-40.

V. 34.—"Evermore give us this bread." This request was very similar to that made by the woman of Samaria, and probably was preferred with as little apprehension of the spiritual meaning of the gift as she had. They thought that if Jesus had anything valuable to bestow they had no objections to receiving it.

V. 35.—"I am the bread of life." He turns their attention away from His own works to Himself. He came to impart His own righteousness and power to men. His miracles were only symbols or object lesson setting forth the true blessings which He was ready to bestow. "He that cometh to me shall never hunger; and he that believeth on me shall never thirst." These clauses are parallel with each other. The coming to Jesus is believing on Him, or receiving Him as redemption and sanctification. To all who thus receive Him He guarantees a perpetual supply of all needs. "There is no want to them that fear him."

V. 36.—"Ye also have seen me and believe not." This people had all the instruction and proof needed for an intelligent and hearty faith. Christ's work for over two years had been well known by all dwelling in those parts; He had furnished abundant and incontrovertible seals of His Father's commission, but the god of this world had blinded their eyes through the deceitfulness of sin.

V. 37.—"All that the Father giveth me shall come to me." The unbelief of the great majority of the Jews could not make the truth of God of none effect. His elect should find their way to Him. "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." As there can be no failure of Christ's work because of the opposition of men, so there can be no failure of the sinner's cause because of indifference on the part of the Saviour. If any man comes to Christ he has in that coming proof of the Father's drawing and assurance of Christ's acceptance.

V. 38.—"For I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me." Jesus was very careful to keep His work in subordina tion to the will of the Father. Redemption is as much the work of the Father as of the Son, and we must not allow the idea of an opposition between them to obtain a place in our minds.

V. 40.—"This is the will of him that sent me." This will of the Father embraces all that is necessary for the complete and glorious success of Jesus as Saviour. It includes all the parts of His work, all the steps in the sinner's experience, and all the effective workings of the Holy Spirit.

LESSONS FOR TO-DAY.

1. We ought not to be contented away from Jesus.

2. We should seek spiritual blessings from Jesus.

3. The world has only husks for the need of our souls.

4. Our souls demand the Bread of Life.

5. Jesus is the Bread of Life for our souls.

6. He only can satisfy our needs.

7. Do not perish with hunger while there is enough and to spare in your Father's house.

To Thee.

[The following letter was written concerning a young man to his sister who had heard that he was ill, and sent him the leaflet, "To Thee." It led the poor wanderer to the Saviour, who filled him with peace, and comforted him in his dying hour.]

DEAR SISTER SARAH: Joe died at five this morning, and it is my opinion that he has gone to heaven, if anybody has ever gone there. I have seen him about every day for the past week, and saw him yesterday when his power of speech had gone. Looking at me and pointing his hand upwards, he wanted to tell me, I think, that he would soon be in heaven. By the way, you sent him a leaflet in his early illness, about six weeks ago. My wife sent it to him by one of the children, and thought no more about it, until it was brought to recollection in a very touching manner. About midnight on Sunday he motioned that he wanted an article of his clothing—a vest I think. When it was brought to him he tried to examine the pockets. His sister-in law took the vest from him, and in one of the pockets she found a crumpled dollar bill, and asked him if that was what he wanted. He shook his head. She then searched farther, and found your leaflet nearly worn out with frequent handling. He nodded quickly that that was what he wanted. It was given to him and he put it to his lips, and then motioned for some one to read it to him, as his eyes were set and nearly useless. His mother asked him if the leaflet met his case? He wrote, "Yes, from the first," and then underneath he wrote, "To the end." The leaflet is all in verse, many lines of which are underlined, and is entitled, "To Thee."

I bring my sins to Thee,
The sins I cannot count,
That all may cleansed be
In Thy once-opened fount.
I bring them, Saviour, all to Thee;
The burden is too great for me.

My heart to Thee I bring,
The heart I cannot read,
A faithless, wandering thing,
An evil heart indeed.
I bring it, Saviour, now to Thee,
That fixed and faithful it may be.

To Thee I bring my care,
The care I cannot flee;
Thou wilt not only share,
But take it all from me.
O loving Saviour, now to Thee
I bring the load that wearies me.

I bring my grief to Thee,
The grief I cannot tell;
No words shall needed be,
Thou knowest all so well.
I bring the sorrow laid on me,
O suffering Saviour, all to Thee.

My joys to Thee I bring,
The joys Thy love has given,
That each may be a wing
To lift me nearer heaven.
I bring them, Saviour, all to Thee,
Who hast procured them all for me.

My life I bring to Thee:
I would not be my own;
O Saviour, let me be
Thine ever, Thine alone!
My heart, my life, my all I bring
To Thee, my Saviour and my King.

—Advocate and Guardian.

THE NORTH AMERICAN INDIAN, in the light of his narrow code of ethics, had a right to pride himself upon the scalps at his belt; they were tangible evidence of his strength and daring. The Esquimaux has sound title to be proud of his mantle clasps of bear claws, since they show that his prowess has helped rid himself and his fellows of a scourge and danger; the hunter of the Alps or of the Tyrol wears proudly the cock's feathers or the chamois' foot in his cap as an emblem of his skill and daring. Each of these ensigns is a token which carries with it, to the eyes and understanding of men, a fixed meaning. It speaks as clearly as by word of mouth a lesson of achievement, and becomes the natural and honorable trophy of its possessor. But how about the garniture of dead birds about the ball dress of a society belle or the paw of a dead fox in the foreground of a society bonnet! That alike outrages poetry and defies prose.—Boston Journal.

RELIGION cannot pass away. The burning of a little straw may hide the stars of the sky; but the stars are there, and will reappear.—Carlyle.

"Another Household Necessity."

IN a recent number of this paper we published a reporter's interview with Mr. Joseph Wild, the venerable and estimable head of the firm of Joseph Wild & Co., of 82 and 84 Worth St., New York, in which he related his experience in the use of the remedial agent known as "Compound Oxygen" administered by Drs. Starkey & Palen, of Philadelphia, which he heartily endorsed An error in the heading of the article, gave to Mr. Wild the credit of being the inventor of "Linoleum," which, as the letter below will show, Mr. Wild hastens to disclaim.

DEAR SIRS: The article entitled "Another Household Necessity—Mr. Wild, the inventor of Linoleum, notes a discovery as valuable as his own," published in the Scientific American of May 8th is misleading, as stating that Mr. Joseph Wild was the inventor of Linoleum. It should have stated that Joseph Wild & Co., 82 & 84 Worth St., New York, are the owners of the patent in the United States and sole manufacturers of Linoleum in the United States. Please insert the above in the papers that have had the mistaken advertisement. JOSEPH WILD.

Beware of Scrofula

Scrofula is probably more general than any other disease. It is insidious in character, and manifests itself in running sores, pustular eruptions, boils, swellings, enlarged joints, abscesses, sore eyes, etc. Hood's Sarsaparilla expels all tracé of scrofula from the blood, leaving it pure, enriched, and healthy.

"I was severely afflicted with scrofula, and for over a year had two running sores on my neck. Took five bottles of Hood's Sarsaparilla, and consider myself cured." C. E. LOVEJOY, Lowell, Mass.

C. A. Arnold, Arnold, Me., had scrofulous sores for seven years, spring and fall. Hood's Sarsaparilla cured him.

Salt Rheum

William Spies, Elyria, O., suffered greatly from erysipelas and salt rheum, caused by handling tobacco. At times his hands would crack open and bleed. He tried various preparations without aid; finally took Hood's Sarsaparilla, and now says: "I am entirely well."

"My son had salt rheum on his hands and on the calves of his legs. He took Hood's Sarsaparilla and is entirely cured." J. B. STANTON, Mt. Vernon, Ohio.

VOL. LVII.—No. 22. WHOLE No. 2914. NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 2, 1886. $2.65 A YEAR IN ADVANCE. No. 48 CHURCH STREET.

EDITORS: Rev. JOHN M. FERRIS, D.D. Rev. N. H. VAN ARSDALE.
ASSOCIATE EDITOR: MRS. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

THE SUNDAY will disappear unless preserved by the Protestant Churches. Last Sabbath the President and a part of his Cabinet travelled from Washington to this city, the out-of-town resorts were thronged with visitors, baseball matches were played, public concerts were given, the fast newspaper trains dispelled the Sunday quiet from New York to Buffalo.

THE PRESIDENT since he entered public life has been one of the most fortunate of men, and his good fortune still attends him in the great matter of choosing a companion, on whom the comfort of his domestic life will depend. No one has anything but good to say of her. All her companions praise her. The sympathies of the nation will attend the young wife as she enters a somewhat trying ordeal. Yet the position of the President's wife, although its duties for a few months in the year may be a tax on her strength, is not a burdensome one. It has many privileges, is free from some of the social demands which other ladies in Washington find wearisome. If she is affable and courteous and regards the regulations of the good society of the capital, little more will be required of her. That the chief magistrate and his wife may be happy in their new relations will be the wish of the nation. All citizens will have a special interest in their welfare.

THE STRIKES are over and it is not pleasant to notice that the Church has had next to no influence in regulating the movement. The great body of the workingmen are not under the instruction or counsel of any church, except it may be that which represents the Papacy. One, and the chief reason, no doubt, is that the workingmen are nearly all foreigners or the children in the first generation of immigrants. They are Romanists or unbelievers or have been only formally connected with a State Church and, on landing on these shores, have been glad to sever the very weak ties which held them to an occasional attendance at a place of Christian worship. They fail altogether to perceive and understand the nature of American Christianity and the life of American churches. Their ways also are not as our ways, and they are naturally reluctant to conform to our mode of life and action. The testimony of the Rev. Mr. Adams, a Congregational missionary to the Bohemians in Chicago, who preaches to them in their own language, is in point and is rather surprising. He writes to the Congregationalist: "Every conversation with Bohemians develops new proof of their ignorance of all that is distinctive of our American civilization. Explanation seems powerless to dispel this ignorance. I have been told in perfect soberness that our physicians seize persons on the streets, break their limbs or maim them in some other way, so as to experiment upon them in the hospital. Not a few of them believe that our evening prayer-meetings are simply schools of immorality and vice." The Hungarians, Italians, Poles and some Germans are no less ignorant of our American life and religion. The Bohemian newspaper is thoroughly infidel, is not anarchical, but grossly misrepresents Christianity, of which it is in almost absolute ignorance, having seen only such Christianity as Romanism presents, and derides religion. It is entirely a materialistic journal.

What then can the Church do? Just what the Church has always done, when it has succeeded in winning the confidence of the mass of a community and in conducting it to a knowledge of and faith in the Scriptures. The Church must make the advances, must welcome these thousands and invite them to her worship or convey her worship to them in a way adapted to their mode of life. The Church must go to them with the truth, in earnestness and prayerfulness, with faith in God, with patience and courage and resolution. They will not come to us. They are here for good or evil. There are anarchists among them, exhorting to violence, robbery and bloodshed. They will be led to regard us as their enemies if the Christian Church leaves them alone. There is no answer to what Mr. Adams writes: "It is high time to begin in earnest to correct our mistakes. It would cost less to build a commodious and attractive chapel in this Bohemian district, to establish and equip a first-class paper, which should give them the truth on social, political and religious questions, than it has been to aid the families of the murdered policemen."

But are our doors to be held open to such an immigration? Does not the Church, and the School, and the State as well, need time to assimilate such and so large additions as have been made to our population during the past twenty years? Have we not work enough on hand for the present? Should there not be some restrictions put upon this inflow of ignorance and irreligion? At all events, ought not the Government to put a stop at once to the importing by contractors of the very lowest class of European laborers?

THE CHURCH CONGRESS has again been in session, this time at Cleveland, and has discussed some of the questions which the Christian people of the country are exceedingly desirous to have light upon. But if the reports which have been made have been correct it is to be feared that no important help will be found in last week's discussions. The necessity of a restatement of belief was considered and a main point, made by one of the leading speakers, was that the old creeds are materialistic. It is doubtful whether that point can be maintained. The creeds do use Scriptural terms in describing the hereafter of those who die in their sins, but those terms have always been regarded as figurative representations of severe suffering of the soul—were so regarded by those who made them a part of the creeds and have always been so regarded. On the other hand unbelievers have always charged that these terms were materialistic, and their accusation has been as constantly denied. Besides, throughout its entire history Christianity has been distinguished by its spirituality. Other religions have been materialistic, this has been the opposite.

Another point rather indirectly presented was that the creeds were colored by the controversies of the times in which they were made, that they were so expressed as to antagonize the religious errors of those times. In part this is true, but only in part. It is doubtful also whether a creed will be formulated in any age which will not be so worded as to guard against the errors of that age. And there has been as little change in error as there has been in truth. Sinful and wilful human nature continually attempts and repeats the same perversions of the truth and asserts the same misbelief and unbelief. Every creed antagonizes that sinful perversion, guards against it and endeavors to preserve itself from an interpretation which can be made to serve the interests of unbelief. The new theology is new only in phraseology. The opinions it advances are venerable with age. It desires a restatement of belief, because the old statement is in opposition to its endeavors and because it is exceedingly difficult to overcome.

But we have thought that a shorter statement of belief would be useful. In this we speak only for ourselves, and claim to represent no one besides ourselves. The old forms have fallen into disuse. Men do not read them, are not familiar with them, do not turn to them for an expression of the teaching of the Word of God. They are long, and the age is given to brevity and terseness. The form of expression in which they are embodied is the form of a past period, is not readily apprehended because not familiar. A short creed in the language of the present time seems to us desirable. If it could be done without discourtesy, could be done with the cheerful consent of the Congregational Church, we would like to have the creed reported by the Committee of the Congregationalists a few years ago, referred to a few competent men that they might add ten or a dozen words to it, and submit it to the churches. We would like to have some words inserted which were proposed, so it was reported, but were rejected by the majority of the committee. So far as it goes that creed is admirable, but it falls short of expressing the full faith of the great body of believers. As it is remembered just now, our impression is that about a dozen words added, one here and another there, would remove that defect. We have supposed that no one has undertaken to make such additions out of regard for the committee and the Church which it represented. Some such short creed we have thought would prove very useful.

But is there a demand for even such a creed. Not to any great extent, so far as we know, among the members of the evangelical churches. Restless spirits, of loose views, given to change, one thing to-day another to-morrow, often inconsistent, talk loudly and often in favor of a restatement of Christian belief. So far as we have been able to get at the root of bitterness within them, they especially wish such a statement as will moderate the Scriptural announcement of the holiness of the Divine nature and the righteousness of the Divine administration, and, as a natural result, a statement of the atonement that will leave out the vicarious, sacrificial element. No existing evangelical denomination can be induced to consent to such a restatement.

A Separate People.

THE branch in this country of the Roman Church is endeavoring to make its adherents a separate people. The decrees of the Baltimore Council, now brought into effect by the endorsement of the Pope, direct every parish priest to establish a parochial school. The purpose is to withdraw the children of Romanists from the public schools and from all schools where they come under the influence of Protestants or of persons not Romanists. Of the defective education these children are sure to get in parochial schools controlled by the priests, it is not our purpose to speak at present in detail. Attention is called only to the fact that everything in the history of Romanism as a politico-religious hierarchy that may be damaging to the organization and everything in the condition of Papistical countries of the same tendency, and everything tending to intellectual independence and promoting the exercise of individual judgment, will be rigidly excluded. The education will be injuriously defective.

By a decree of the same Council intermarriages with Protestants or persons not Romanists are virtually condemned, and the language will make upon many fair-minded persons the impression that Rome does not recognize such marriages as valid. This, of course, whatever time may prove to be the real meaning of the decree, is intended to make and keep the Romanists of the United States a separate people.

The Romanists, also, everywhere in the land, where they are numerous enough to wield the necessary political influence, are attempting to keep their juvenile delinquents, their orphan and half-orphan children, and the children of Romanists whose parents do not support them or who wish to put their support on the community,—to keep all these under an exclusively Papistical management and instruction. They have their institutions for each of these classes. They have their agents in the courts to watch the commitments. Their representatives are found wherever any of these classes of persons are disposed of by Commissioners or Justices or public officers of any kind, and if either of the parents is or has been a Romanist the child or young person is claimed for the Papistical institution. And these institutions are rigidly Papistical, no one but a Papist is employed in them or allowed to have any influence over the inmates. That the maintenance of these institutions is drawn mainly from the public treasury is very well known, but it is not so well known that an insignificant portion is obtained from the gifts of Romanists, although these asylums, homes, etc., are reckoned as charitable establishments. But the point this article would chiefly present is that the plan steadily pursued is to make Romanists of every age and condition a separate people. To carry this policy out consistently a persistent attempt is also made to separate the Romanists in Houses of Refuge, jails and prisons, controlled by the local or general government, from the other prisoners, and to hold them under an instruction exclusively Papistical.

Such is the policy in this country, visible to all who have eyes to see. It is a confession of weakness. It is an acknowledgment that the Papistical system cannot hold its own if Romanists are allowed to pass under the instruction which is approved by all people not Romanists. The all other people are certainly not inferior in any respect to the Romanists,—are not inferior in religious belief and practice—and what they approve is certainly as beneficial as anything proposed by Romanism.

It is an unwise policy. When it becomes fully developed it will arouse the antagonism of an intelligent free people. It will become difficult to secure the consent of such a people to donations from the public treasury for the maintenance of the system. At present in this city and probably in other localities the appropriations of public money to some institutions, managed by Protes tants, have been reduced; but no reductions are made on the allowances to Papistical institutions. But, as the policy now under notice becomes more evident, such reductions will be made. The people will some day resolve that they will not contribute toward the support of a separate people who are under the control of the Papal hierarchy.

Besides, in due time, the intelligent free people of the United States will believe and declare that this Papistical policy is dangerous to the commonwealth and will demand that it shall cease. They will say that the education given is so defective as to be positively injurious to the State, and will oppose it by all lawful means. They will say also that a people sharing the general prosperity are not to be held aloof in this style from the general competition and the general duties and burdens. They will maintain also that such a domination by a priesthood, appointed at Rome and governed from Rome—an alien hierarchy—is dangerous to the Republic. And all this will come to the ears of Romanists, and they will rebel and throw off this priestly domination as they have done and are doing in Italy and France and Mexico, and in other countries. Romanists will perceive after a time what a cheat the defective education they have received has been. They will see clearly how their advantages have been limited injuriously and of what opportunities they have been deprived, and the most resolute and persistent opposition to the priestly policy will come from Romanists.

What then is the Papacy and its adherents to do? Die out and pass away if it cannot meet such a body as Protestant Christians compose on common ground, or strip its creed of human fabrications and the remains of paganism, conform its belief to the Word of God and become a true Christian organization mingling freely on equal terms with all men.

II.

THE COLLEGE PASTOR. . . . CHAPLAIN MILBURN. . . . HOW NOT TO PRAY.

THE solution of the "Religion in a College" question, to which the overseers of Harvard University have come, is certainly a brilliant and original one. And when we consider that it is Harvard, where "religion" has been falling into a designed decay for years, and where even a perfunctory chapel service has been maintained only on compulsion and almost in the face of a rebellion, the new arrangement seems quite a clear gain, and certainly illustrates the force of public opinion and the value of discussion. The new departure, in fact, is in a measure a return.

The plan is to fill the "Plummer professorship," which has been vacant since the retirement of Dr. A. P. Peabody, and which is practically the chaplaincy of the College. This position has been offered to Dr. F. G. Peabody, of the Divinity School. With him will be associated five others, who shall each serve continuously for the five or six weeks allotted to him, holding chapel services, preaching regularly on Sundays and performing the full duties of a "pastor." Among those to whom these appointments have been tendered are Drs. Phillips Brooks, Edward Everett Hale, McKenzie, and Gordon of the Old South Church. Peabody is an advanced Unitarian, Hale is a somewhat more conservative one, and the theology of the other three is of a sufficiently "new" and broad type to insure the students against any dis turbing infusion of evangelical fanaticism or brutal Calvinism. Still it will be much better than nothing, and better than an unmixed and unadulterated Unitarianism. And as it is not proposed to put attendance upon religious services among the "electives," the students will be compelled to take a good deal of spiritual medicine, and will feel a constant countercurrent to the prevailing agnosticism of the University.

But I have become more and more convinced that, if the religious training of a college is to be much else than a form of godliness without the power thereof, there should be a real pastor. He should be simply and solely called to minister to the souls of the young men. He should have no other duties, and above all should not be a member of the Faculty, nor have anything to do in the discipline of the insti tution. He must feel free to deal in a purely personal (and, if I may be permitted to use the word in its conventional and technical sense, a priestly) way with the sins and follies of the students. And they must not only not associate him in their thoughts with government and police, but must regard him as one to whom they may safely confide as a neutral party, and even as their special friend and advocate. He should be responsible for the preaching, but not of course required to do it all in person. He should have time and strength for religious organization among the pious students, for leadership and coöperation in meetings and other spiritual endeavors, and for cultivating personal acquaintance and doing personal work among all his young constituency. Such a man, if he be thoroughly devoted, spiritually minded, and with a genius for winning the confidence and affection of young men, would find the most inviting field in the world, both as respects the inspiration and delight of the work itself and the greatness and gladness of the results. But it would all depend upon the question whether he were wisely selected, and with reference primarily to his pastoral qualities.

If our House of Representatives does not walk in wisdom's ways, it will not be for lack of prayer and exhortation on the part of its chaplain, the Rev. W. H. Milburn. He is really an eloquent man, albeit of the spread-eagle school of rhetoric. Many years ago he used to be one of our most effective and popular lecturers, as well as preachers. His blindness, combined with his remarkable independence of that infirmity, as in the case of the late Postmaster-General Fawcett of England, won for him of course a peculiar sympathy. But, like Mr. Fawcett, he was full of vitality and cheerfulness; and all be said was stamped with his original and forceful personality. I should judge that these qualities have grown with his advanced age, at the same time that his opportunities of impressing his earnest views upon the world have diminished. And now when he finds himself occupying the tremendous vantage-ground of a position where he can have the ear of the representatives of the nation once a day for ten minutes, the chance is too good to be resisted.

To be sure, he is put there to pray. But whatever man meant by his appointment, God, in his opinion, meant that he should improve his opportunity to lay before these men the will of God concerning them and the nation in a way not to be mistaken. Thomas H. Benton once accused a fellow senator of "putting a stump-speech into the belly of his bill." Mr. Milburn has studied the art of putting sermons of the most luminous and stirring kind into the bosom of his prayers. He takes up in order the moral aspects of the times, their agnosticism and pessimism, intemperance in its various "questions," the many forms of gambling, political corruption at the polls and in office, obscene literature and demoralizing entertainments, the social evil, the growth of luxury, the secularizing of church management, the labor problems, and the many other ways in which (to use his own expression) "our boasted civilization is stained with blots as of death." These harangues have been quite a feature of the season, and are probably listened to as no chaplain's "prayers" have been heard for many a year. And we may hope that some opening of the eyes and pricking of the conscience are the result. Of course, disgust could only follow, if it were suspected that Mr. Milburn had any ambition to air his own eloquence, or was intent on anything but doing good.

But must not such culminating instances hasten the time when our public devotions shall not be left so utterly at the mercy of individual eccentricity or incompetence? The cumulative result of my experience as a hearer of other men's prayers has been an amazement, and almost a despair, in the matter of extemporaneous prayer. It has really seemed as if most ministers had not obtained, by instruction or reflection, any clear conception of what a "common prayer" is. And the worst of it is that intellectual or preaching ability, while it may improve the rhetoric of the prayer, is no guarantee for its genuineness or suitableness. There are times when I feel not only un-"led" and uninterpreted, but when a sense of something like outrage and profanation comes over me at the intrusion of the leader's personality or preaching between me and the longings of my penitent or adoring heart after God. I love freedom in worship as well as anyone, and therefore I am repelled by the narrow and rigid limitations of an unchanging liturgy. But there is such a thing as a license, indulged in by the one man who voices the prayer, which tramples on the freedom of every one whom he pretends to lead but in reality dominates and drags through the sinuosities of his own thought or the raptures of his private devotion—or, worse still, calls upon to listen to him when they would be talking with God.

I have no time now to enter into the merits, or demerits, of this vital and pressing matter. But it seems to me that it becomes our distinctively liturgical Church to invite development in that direction, rather than in the tendency to bareness, if not carelessness, which has characterized our history as a whole. It puzzles me why we should be so scrupulous about our hymns, and in requiring certain liturgical forms on special occasions, and yet give leave to anybody who may happen to occupy our pulpits to vent himself in prayer, unchecked, at the expense of our people. Why might we not have a generous selection of common prayers, covering all the essentials of public worship, and at the same time allow a certain latitude of adaptation to the special and changing circumstances of the hour, particularly in the matter of intercession? If a portion of our prayers were obliged to be taken from approved models,—such as those of our own Church, which have been allowed to fall into desuetude, and those of Calvin, Knox and Bucer, and the prayers and collects of the Fathers and of the Church of England—it would be such an education in the blessed art of public prayer as would insure the propriety, directness, condensation, and common adaptation of the ex tempore parts.

Meanwhile, and at all events, let there be as careful, constant, and practical training of students for this part of their duties as for the sermonizing. And let no one be suffered to go forth as a framer and offerer of the prayers of God's people, till he has learned to merge his own private meditations in their desires and petitions, and not to obtrude himself between them and the light of God. "Lord, teach us to pray!"

PRINCETON, N. J., May 24th, 1886.

The Little Quakeress.

BROWN-EYED Ruth, the Quaker's daughter,
In her dress of simple gray,
Walked beside her quiet grandpa
'Mid the garden flowers of May.

Beds of tulips bright and golden,
Hyacinths of every shade,
Pansies, like sweet childish faces
Looking up to greet the maid.

How they reveled in the sunshine,
While 'mid clumps of violets blue,
Filling all the air with fragrance,
Glistened still the morning dew.

Then outspoke the little maiden,
Looking at her dress of gray,
"Grandpa, can thee tell the reason
Why God made the flowers so gay?

"While we wear the quiet colors
That thee knows we never meet,
E'en in clover or the daisies
That we trample under feet?

"Seems to me a Quaker garden
Should not grown such colors bright."
Roguishly the brown eyes twinkled,
While her grandpa laughed outright.

"True it is, my little daughter,
Flowers wear not the Quaker gray;
But they neither toil nor labor
For their beautiful array.

"Feeling neither pride nor envy,
'Mong their sister flowers, thee knows,
Well content to be a daisy,
Or a tall and queenly rose.

"Keeping still the same old fashions
Of their grandmothers of yore;
Else how should we know the flowers,
If each spring new tints they wore?

"Even so the Quaker maiden
Should be all content to-day,
As a tulip or a pansy,
In her dress of simple gray."

Once again the brown eyes twinkled;
"Grandpa, thee is always right;
So thee sees, by thy own showing,
Some may dress in colors bright.

"Those whom thee calls worldly people,
In their purple and their gold,
Are no gayer than these pansies
Or their grandmothers of old.

"Yet, thee knows I am contented
With this quiet life of ours,
Still, for all, I'm glad, dear grandpa,
That there are no Quaker flowers." —The Record.

The Lone Monument in the Children's Plot.

"BURY ME WITH THE CHILDREN."

["Old Colony" some time ago contributed a graphic article on Greenwood Revisited, in which he said, "It is affecting to see, in the centre of these little graves the tomb of a teacher who asked to have his remains laid among them." The following sketch, describing this teacher and the famous man who rests by his side, will be of interest to those who visit the great city of the dead.—ED.]

THE visitor to Greenwood Cemetery, in passing along the drive or the footpath on the western side of the grounds, has his attention called to the beautiful lawn which is nearly filled with the graves of the little ones, known as the "Children s Plot." In the centre of the plot the eye is attracted by a single shaft, standing like a guardian angel watching the slumbers of the infant immortals.

The lone monument marks the resting place of Samuel Waddington Seton, whose father was the first President of the Bank of New York. Mr. Seton was born on January 23d, 1789, and died November 20th, 1870. By the decease of both his parents he was left an orphan at an early age. He received an academic education and entered upon commercial life. Having the aid of John Jacob Astor, he made a trading voyage to China, which was unsuccessful. On his return in 1807 he accepted an appointment in the Bank of New York, where he remained a number of years. In 1823 he was elected a trustee of the Public School Society, and three years afterwards, in 1826, he accepted the appointment of Agent of the Society, making a considerable pecuniary sacrifice, both actual and prospective, in order that he might occupy a sphere for which he was peculiarly fitted. His office, under the organization of the Society, made him the Superintendent of Schools, the duties of which he discharged until the dissolution of the Society in 1853, by the transfer to the Board of Education. He was elected Assistant Superintendent by the Board, and continued in the service until his death.

Mr. Seton was singularly devoted to the cause of Sunday-school instruction, and while he was himself an Episcopalian, he became Superintendent of the Sunday-school connected with the Beriah Baptist church, of which Rev. Duncan Dunbar was pastor, the duties of which he discharged until a short time before his death—nearly fifty years. During all this period he had been absent only twelve times, by reason of absence from the city on official duty, or by sickness. For many years Mr. Seton's Sunday-school held the foremost rank, and attracted visitors from every part of the country, as well as from abroad. He was peculiarly fitted for the work, and his numerous writings for children were models at the time and gave an impetus to the literature for the young.

Mr. Seton never married. He lost his affianced, who was removed by death, and consecrated himself to the life-work he honored and adorned. He was singularly effective and attractive in his addresses to children, well informed and abounding in apt and beautiful illustrations. His dying request was the last expression of his affection for the young, "Bury me with the children!" In compliance with this request his grave was made in the centre of the Children's Plot. The teachers of New York erected the monument to his memory, upon which is inscribed the favorite sentiment of his life—"PEACE."

Mr. Seton was intimately associated with Mrs. Divie Bethune and her co-laborers in the organization of the Infant School system which attracted so much attention at one period of our educational history.

On approaching the monument, a second but smaller memorial stone is to be seen. At the side of Mr. Seton's grave now lie the remains of the once distinguished Joseph Lancaster, known as the founder of the Lancasterian system. Mr. Lancaster was an Englishman, who crossed the ocean several times for the advancement of the common schools and to promote the spread of his system of instruction. My first recollections of him personally date back to 1827–1829 in the city of Quebec, where he inspected the schools. He came to New York city in 1838, and having paid a visit to Grammar School No. 7, in Chrystie street, he crossed Grand street, but was knocked down by a carriage and was so severely injured that he died on the second day afterward, October 24th, 1838.

Mr. Lancaster was a member of the Society of Friends, and was buried in the old cemetery of the Society in Houston street, near Chrystie. On the removal of the remains from that spot, in 1874, the writer was notified of the fact. The remains were preserved and placed in my care, and on making an appeal through a committee of teachers, the authorities of Greenwood gave permission to place the relics of this celebrated educator at the side of Mr. Seton, and a contribution from some of the teachers provided for the less conspicuous but durable granite block bearing his name, which now marks the place where lie the ashes of England s greatest school reformer of the early part of the century. It is a fitting companionship for the two men who devoted their lives to the highest interests of children.

WM. OLAND BOURNE.

The Reminiscences of "Ambrose."

THE Rev. J. Ambrose Wight, D.D., known as "Ambrose" by the readers of the Evangelist, observed at Bay City, Michigan, on May 2d, the twenty-first anniversary of his settlement there as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, and indulged in interesting personal recollections. From the report in the Evangelist the following extract is taken:

"Central Massachusetts in the days of his boyhood, though an old country, was in a very primitive condition. Its inhabitants had little furniture in their houses, seldom a carpet, next to never a piano; they cooked in fire-places, keeping fire over night on the hearth, for lucifer matches had not come. The district school kept three months in summer and three in winter; he attended only in the winter. All the people kept the Sabbath and went to church. The old parson wore the cocked hat, long stockings, and great knee-buckles of the Revolutionary period, and the children repeated to him the Shorter Catechism in the church aisle. He ministered to that people forty-seven years. His neighbors served their churches respectively thirty six, thirty-seven, sixty and sixty years. And though there was no sensationalism, whole families lived and died Christians.

"When 'Ambrose' went to northern Vermont, it was more primitive than Massachusetts. The settlers dwelt in log houses, and hunted deer, bears and wolves.

"Long Island, a dozen to twenty miles from New York city, where Gen. Washington led his army in the Revolution, had no log houses, nor logs to build them of; but the ways of the people were more primitive than in central Massachusetts or northern Vermont.

"In Bennington, Vt., the young man found his Bethel. Thence he made his way to Williams College. That was primitive too. It had but three, instead of eleven buildings as now. It had three regular professors, with a president and a tutor. The students and the professors went down the hill for water, sawed their wood, carried it to their rooms, and burned it in fire-places. They were called, summer and winter, at four and a half o'clock in the morning for devotions at the chapel, where there was no fire, and thence to recitation before breakfast.

"From Williams College 'Ambrose' went to Chicago, where were about 5,000 people living in wood houses a story and a story and a half high, with no pavements, or sewerage, or gas-lights, or suitable sidewalks. It had a Presbyterian church, which worshipped sometimes—for it had no minister—in a wood schoolhouse; and when first there, a slough before it, to be crossed that Sabbath morning on benches brought out of the house for a bridge.

"He walked up to Milwaukee, 110 miles, and found it newer and rougher than Chicago. He walked out to Rock River, 100 miles, with axe on his shoulder, which was found useful in felling a tree across the Kishwakie Creek, too deep for fording. The place where Belvidere now is, with its 15,000 people; the place where Rockford (20,000) with its great manufacturing industries now is; also where Beloit with its fine college is situated—were all looked at. At Rockton, where six years were spent, there were no families living; the young men did their own housekeeping. As there was no church for near two years, he walked one year four miles to a Methodist meeting, and the next season five miles with the Congregationalists.

"On returning to Chicago in May, 1843, there were two Presbyterian churches. The one he joined (R. W. Patterson, pastor,) worshipped in a wood building 40x60 feet and 14 feet story, costing $1,400. Here he had charge of a journal for fourteen years—agricultural, horticultural, and educational. There was no school system in Illinois. The system now in use there had its birth from that office. The cultivation of prairie lands was all new, and questions of breaking the grounds, cultivating grasses, keeping sheep, fencing, fruit growing, etc., had to be discussed and settled. That paper was their helper.

"On being connected with a religious journal, much that was rough and new was encountered still. It was a period of religious disturbance, as the present is of finance and labor. The terrible question of slavery rent churches, divided neighborhoods, and alienated families for some twenty years; and Chicago was headquarters of the dispute for 'the West.'"

"HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION." Bampton Lectures for 1885. By F. W. Farrar, D.D., F.R.S. This volume is worthy of its place in the long line of Bampton lectures, and does credit to its author. He divides the subject into seven periods, viz., Rabbinic, Alexandrian, Patristic, Scholastic, Reformation, Post-Reformation and Modern. These divisions are well taken, and are treated in the main with learning and candor. We know of no similar work in English that contains as much and as varied information on these points as this one. But the book is sadly deformed by some of the author's lax notions. The Bible is inspired only so far as it does not confuse our sense of right and wrong (p. 29, note). Canticles cannot possibly admit of a spiritual or typical interpretation (p. 33). Our Lord plainly taught that the law of the Old Testament was an imperfect law (p. 39). Ezra is responsible for the stiff-necked formalism of the later Jews (p. 56). Calvin contemptuously rejected the whole sacrificial and ceremonial law (p. 350). Intolerance has been the curse and ruin of Calvinism (p. 352), as if that system had any more than any other of that day. But despite these crudities and stupidities, and others like them, the book is an acceptable contribution to theological literature; onl the student is to read with watchfulness and care (E. P. Dutton & Co)

The Philadelphia Auxiliary to the Woman's Board of Missions.

FOR the past six years the ladies connected with the First, Second and Third Reformed churches of Philadelphia have maintained an Auxiliary to the Woman's Board of Missions. Beginning with an annual subscription of about $200, they have steadily increased the amount until, for the year just ended, their contributions reached the sum of $178. Of this $50 was appropriated to Domestic Missions. A portion of the amount was raised by means of what is called a "missionary basket." Useful and fancy articles with refreshments are contributed by the managers and their friends, and are sold on a certain evening. On this occasion addresses are made by the pastors of the churches, and efforts put forth to awaken a deeper interest in the work of missions. During the past winter the missionary basket brought in $137.

A public meeting was held last November, when Mrs. Sutten, a returned missionary of the Baptist Church, addressed the Society.

The Mission Gleaner and The Gospel in All Lands are taken by the Auxiliary, and are most efficient in disseminating information concerning Christian work in foreign lands.

The reflex influence of this work for missions upon those engaged in it has been very marked. Never before in the history of these churches has information concerning our mission work been so general, and never has more prayer been offered and more money contributed. Monthly meetings are held by the Auxiliary, at which missionary intelligence is presented. These meetings have been exceedingly interesting and profitable, and have been the means of awakening a deeper sense of personal responsibility and a more earnest desire to send the glad tidings of salvation to those who are sitting in the darkness of heathenism. The Venerable School.

THE 253d Commencement Exercises of the School of the Collegiate Dutch Church were held last Thursday evening in the presence of a large and very attentive audience. After the singing of an anthem (Psalm 98) prayer was offered by Rev. Dr. Vermilye, the senior pastor. Miss Jessie B. French delivered the salutatory, and the class prophecy was read by Miss Emma B. Laws. Charles M. French declaimed "The Blue and the Gray," as appropriate for Decoration Day. "The Small, Sweet Courtesies of Life" was very effectively read by Miss Mattie Petry, and Miss Josie Bowron executed a piano solo, Tendresse. Numerous premiums and prizes for commendable progress or superior excellence were presented to the happy recipients by Judge Bookstaver, who presided, and Mr. John S. Bussing, of the Board of Trustees. "The Tapestry Weavers," which was highly appreciated by the audience, was read by Miss Lizzie Overocker. Alex. R. Boyce declaimed "John Maynard, the Martyr," with a full, clear voice, and Miss Jennie E. Swan kept the audience in a roar of laughter by the admirable manner in which she recited "The Country Justice."

All of these exercises received well-merited applause, which must have been very gratifying to the incipient orators. The rendering of the choruses, "The Belfry Tower," "Night," and "O, Who Will o'er the Downs So Free?" sustained the well-earned reputation in singing for which this School has been so long distinguished, and showed the careful training of the scholars by their teacher.

After an earnest and very affecting address to the graduates by Dr. Vermilye, the venerable and venerated pastor, assisted by Augustus S. Whiton, Esq., of the Board of Trustees, presented the graduates with the "Honors" of the School. The class consisted of the Misses Josephine Bowron, Jessie B. French, Emma B. Laws, Lizzie Overocker, Mattie Petry, Jennie E. Swan, Alex. R. Boyce, Charles M. French, and Miss Nellie B. Hewlett, who was selected as the valedictorian, having passed during the last seven years, in the most creditable manner, from the Introductory to the highest position in the Senior class.

Addresses were made by Rev. Drs. Chambers and Ormiston, both of whom descanted upon the thoroughness of the intellectual and moral instruction imparted by the Institution, as manifested in the useful lives of the graduates, one of whom, Samuel E. Sproulls, Esq., who graduated 62 years ago, was seated upon the platform, together with Trustees Robert Schell, R. N. Perlee, Abraham V. W. Van Vechten, and Elders Peter Donald and Henry Talmadge. We noticed also among the audience Rev. James M. Dickson, D.D., and Peter R. Warner, Esq, an ex-trustee, who was a member of the Board for 19 years, and has always been a firm friend of the School.

The exercises, which throughout confirm the efficiency of this nursery of the Church to prepare the youth instructed therein to resist the socialistic, materialistic and agnostic perils so disastrously prevalent, were closed with the doxology and the benediction by Rev. Dr. Vermilye, who most impressively and affectionately invoked God's blessing on the youth assembled before him, and upon the Institution in which they are being trained for future usefulness in the Church and in society.

....BRIGHTON HEIGHTS, STATEN ISLAND.—The month of May has been one of marked interest in our church. On the first Sabbath, our pastor, Rev. W. W. Clark, preached a stirring sermon on foreign missions, resulting in an offering three times as large as any previous one, and awakening an increased interest especially among those heretofore indifferent. On the second Sabbath there was an unusually large attendance at the communion service, nine being received into the church on confession and three by letter. This makes thirty-one new communicants on confession since Jan. 1st. On the third Sabbath the 59th anniversary of the Sunday-school was held at the evening service. The church was crowded, many sitting in the aisles and others standing in the vestibule. The singing by the children was a marked feature and the address by Mr. E. J. Herrick, of New York, was listened to with rapt attention.

On Monday evening, the 24th, the Richmond Co. S. S. Association held its annual meeting, delegates coming from all parts of the Island. The main address was given by Mr. Ralph Wells, of New York, and his stirring words aroused all Christian workers to the highest state of enthusiasm. All admitted that this meeting was the best one ever held.

On Thursday evening, the 27th, the Brighton Heights Mission Band held its fifth anniversary. The chapel was filled. The singing, recitations, dialogues, and reports from the young members were greatly appreciated by the audience. The breaking of the missionary jugs was the special feature of the meeting. The pennies and nickels in 45 jugs were counted and credited to each member. The sums ranged from 25 cents to $11.48, the latter amount contributed by one member, who filled two jugs. The largest amount in a single jug was given by a little girl, amounting to $8.20. Total, $102.76. In "the Japanese tea party" 300 cups of tea were served, each person taking home the cup and saucer as a memento. Ice cream and cake were sold, and the proceeds, together with the 25 cents for admission tickets, will swell the net amount to a large figure.

Altogether our church is in a most prosperous condition, spiritually and materially, for which we all have reason to be profoundly thankful. COR.

....CLAVERACK, N. Y.—The Rev. Wm. J. Leggett, pastor of the Reformed Church, and his wife were agreeably surprised on the evening of May 17th—the tenth anniversary of their marriage—by a visit from the congregation. Among the invited guests were Rev. Messrs. Wm Veenschoten and John G. Gebhard. The former, in a short and happy address, presented to Mr. and Mrs. Leggett a beautiful ice pitcher, several articles of valuable tinware, and over one hundred dollars in cash—the gifts of their parishioners and friends, in honor of their tin wedding, and as a testimonial of the high esteem in which they are held.

....THE CLASSIS OF PASSAIC at its special session, May 25th, in the Church of Pompton, dissolved the pastoral relation existing between the Rev. T. J. Kommers and said church, to take effect on June 14th. He was dismissed to the Classis of New York. The Classis and people regret this short pastorate, but hope the brother will be eminently successful in his new field of labor.

A certificate from the Presbytery of Washington city, given to the Rev. C. R. Von Romondt, to the Classis, was presented and accepted; and when he shall be present and sign the formula "in the Book of Minutes, in the presence of the Classis," he will be enrolled as a member.

A call from the Sixth Church of Paterson, (Holland,) upon Rev. J. A. De Bruyn was approved. Mr. De Bruyn for a short time in 1885 was pastor of this church, but owing to sad bereavements in his wife's family his relation as pastor was dissolved, and he returned to the Netherlands. It is not known whether he will accept. S. C.

....THE CLASSIS OF ALBANY met in special session May 24th; dissolved the pastoral relation between the Rev. J. P. Davis and the First Church of Bethlehem, N. Y., and approved a call extended to Mr Davis from the Third Church of Albany. His installation is to take place on the evening of June 14th.

A Fruitful Ministry.

THE recent decease of Rev. Abr. H. Meyers calls to mind some of the facts in connection with his ministry over the churches of Berne and Beaverdam. His installation took place in the Church of Berne, November 30th, 1831, and was followed immediately by a four days' meeting, held successively in the two churches. Scores of men and women were led to confess Christ at this time, who were admitted into fellowship. And this revival was but the beginning of the harvest that was gathered in during all his ministry here.

His subsequent preaching confirmed his work. Broad and deep were the characters that were established during his ministry, of which the present generation seems but a shadow. The truths he proclaimed and the life he led were perpetual reminders that his was no earth-born ministry. He was building not for the present, but for the future. Young men were urged by him to give themselves to Christ in the service of the Gospel ministry, and his keen wisdom led him to select the best materials for this work. Under his care three young men began such a course, and these are living to-day to attest the value of his work. The first of these is the Hon. Joseph P. Bradley, who, although he changed his purpose, has been conspicuous as a Christian educator. The second is the Hon. Jacob I. Warner, who, after entering college, turned his attention to the law and became prominent in legal matters throughout the State of New York. The third is the Rev. Joseph Knieakern, who, for the period of twenty-seven years, was the successful and devoted pastor of the Church of St. Johnsville, N. Y. These, together with many in the humbler spheres in life, are living to witness to the earnestness and power of this man of God.

Under him the churches of Berne and Beaverdam were separated and their boundaries fixed. Cases of discipline were frequent, and persons of loose conduct and immoral character were, after careful investigation, suspended from the communion of the church.

The records show seven Sabbath-schools in successful operation, two tract societies, a female missionary society and a temperance organization numbering four hundred members. Every department of church work felt the influence of his personal magnetism. His pastoral labors were abundant and his preparation for the pulpit was always full and complete. During the four years of his ministry every communion season was a Pentecost, and people felt that they were actually living within the dispensation of the Spirit. R. D.

In Memoriam.

ON this, the first anniversary of the Woman's Missionary Society of the Classis of Newark, we sadly miss the face and counsels of one who was prominent among us. After a sudden and brief illness, on the second day of April, 1886, Mrs. James Browe, our first Secretary, passed quietly yet triumphantly into the "house of many mansions." About the last work she did was in the preparation and forwarding of notices for the annual meeting of this organization. To the end she was faithful. Death found her busy at her post of duty. All who knew her can bear testimony to the fact that this Society, and, indeed, the whole work of the Master, lay very near to her heart. It was her first thought and her highest care. "The memory of the just is blessed." We are told that in the Cathedral of Saint Mark's at Venice,—a marvellous building, lustrous with an Oriental splendor far beyond description,—there are pillars said to have been brought from Solomon's temple. These are of alabaster, a substance firm and durable as granite, and yet so transparent that the light glows through it most freely. Such a pillar in the Church of Christ was Mrs. Browe. Her faith was firm. Her character was transparent. Her will was strong. Her life was useful. Her end was peace. Wondering who will take up the burden she laid down, we pray, "O, Thou Master Builder, place more such pillars in Thy temple." To this brief tribute to her memory we append the following resolutions:

Whereas, The Great Head of the Church has called this well-beloved sister into the upper sanctuary, be it

Resolved, That while we realize the loss which the cause we represent has sustained in the removal of one of the most self-denying and earnest workers in its behalf, we yet humbly bow to the Divine will, hoping that the influence of her evident consecration may incite us to closer fellowship with Him whose is the kingdom.

Resolved, That we extend our sympathy to her husband, an honored elder of the Reformed Church at Belleville, praying that the "Mighty God of Jacob" will make the valley of Baca through which he is passing to be filled with wells of heavenly consolation.

Resolved, That this memorial be entered upon the records of this Society. SEC.

....HON. F. T. FRELINGHUYSEN.—In Mt. Pleasant Cemetery at Newark, N. J , an obelisk of granite, forty feet in height, has been erected, bearing this appropriate inscription:

Frederick Theodore Frelinghuysen.
Born at Millstone, N. J., Aug. 4, 1817; died at Newark May 20, 1885.
Attorney-General of the State of New Jersey, 1861 to 1867; Senator of the United States, 1867 to 1869, 1871 to 1877; Secretary of State of United States 1881 to 1885.
"The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom."

On the obverse side is the following:

A diligent and conservative statesman, a sincere friend and wise counsellor; busy in the affairs of life, he walked humbly and trustfully with his God. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

....CHICAGO, ILL.—The First Church received thirty-two new members on May 16th.

....ROSELAND, ILL.—A Woman's Missionary Society has just been organized.

....PERSONALS.—Rev. H. M. Voorhees has accepted the call to the Church of Helderberg, N. Y., and begins his labors there next Sabbath ...Rev. Anson DuBois, D.D., and wife arrived by steamer "Advance" on Saturday, May 21st, from St. Thomas, W. I., having resigned that charge. He will gladly preach as a supply Address, Catskill, N. Y.

....THE CLASSIS OF SCHOHARIE held a special meeting, May 25th, at Schoharie Mountain, N. Y., and dissolved the pastoral relation between the Rev. Wm. D. Buckelew and the Church of Schoharie Mountain, and dismissed him to the Presbytery of Central Dakota. The pastoral relation between the Rev. J. Howard Van Doren and the Church of Gallupville, N. Y., was also dissolved, and he was dismissed to the Classis of Ulster, where he has a call to labor.

....PHILADELPHIA, PA.—The Rev. Mr. Taylor who had a part in the recent meeting of the Third Church to express thankfulness for the action of the Particular Synod, was not the Rev. Wm. R. Taylor, but a minister of another denomination. The Rev. W. R. Taylor is one of the Commissioners of the Classis of Philadelphia to the General Synod to oppose the action of the Particular Synod.

....MADISON AVE. CHURCH, NEW YORK.—The Rev. Abbott E. Kittredge, D.D., of Chicago, has accepted the call of the Madison Ave. Church, and expects to begin his ministry there on the first Sabbath of September. Dr. Kittredge is a native of Boston, was the pastor of a Congregational church in San Francisco, afterward was settled over a Presbyterian church on East 15th street in this city, which became most prosperous under his ministry. The chief work of his life has been as pastor of the Third Presbyterian Church of Chicago. Seventeen years ago he began his ministry there, when the membership was 240. It is now 2,300. The Young People's Monday Evening Meeting has an attendance of over 200, the weekly church prayer meeting an attendance of over 500. Dr. Kittredge is a popular preacher and has unusual administrative ability. He leaves Chicago only be cause the cold winds of the spring are too trying for him.

The Madison Ave. Church, during the pastorate of the Rev. Dr. E. A. Reed, has raised the large amount of nearly $120,000, by which it has been almost relieved of debt. It has also given more and more freely to the Boards and Funds of the Church—the amount last year, the largest since it occupied its present site, was $4,500. The number of families and members has also increased, and a prosperous life is confidently anticipated under Dr. Kittredge.

....HACKENSACK, N. J.—The Rev. Herman Vanderwart was installed pastor of the First Church, Tuesday evening, May 25th. Rev. J. F. Harris presided, read the form and gave the charge to the pastor. Rev. David Cole, D.D., preached the sermon, and the Rev. Arthur Johnson charged the people. There was a large audience present who entered heartily into the interesting services. A liberal display of flowers about the pulpit added cheer to the occasion.

....THE CLASSIS OF NEW BRUNSWICK on May 28th licensed Robert V. Palmer, George Z. Collier and Wm. I. Chamberlain to preach the Gospel. Mr. Palmer has accepted a call to the Church of Griggstown, N. J., and will settle there about the mid dle of June. S. C.

....THE HUDSON RIVER MINISTERIAL ASSOCIATION met in the Reformed church at Chatham, May 24th and 25. An exegesis was read by Rev. C. H. Polhemus on Isa. 53: 8. The sermon, by Rev. C. W. Fritts, was upon Christ our Example, 1 Peter 2: 21. Rev. H. V. S. Myers, D.D., read an essay on Explorations in Jerusalem. In everything but the number of members in attendance this was a model meeting. The brethren upon whom special duties devolved came from the extreme boundaries of the Association, with papers admirably prepared, and the hearty tone of the discussions showed how thoroughly their work was appreciated. Second Reformed Church of Kalamazoo.

EDITOR INTELLIGENCER: Suffer me to submit to your readers a few facts and considerations relating to this church.

1. Circumstances that led to its organization. There are three Holland churches in this city; the First Reformed, the Christian Reformed and the Independent, of which the First Reformed is by far the strongest. All hold the same doctrinal standards, and together represent a Holland population of 4,000. Many of the young people are sufficiently Americanized to prefer the English language, customs and usages above the Holland. This prompted several, though not in full sympathy with their teachings, to unite with American churches—Presbyterian, Congregational, Baptist and Methodist Episcopal—there being no English speaking Reformed Church in the city. Now the Holland Church having always been faithful in catechising and otherwise training the children in the doctrines of the Reformed Church, felt grieved to see them when they had attained sufficient knowledge and Christian experience, unite with churches of another order simply because of their language. Yet this course would likely continue and increase from year to year. And the absorption of its best elements by other denominations would eventually result in the entire extinction of the Reformed church in this city. To prevent this, the organization of a Second Reformed Church was effected on June 30th, 1885, with 34 members and a Sunday-school with 40 scholars.

2. Does this English-speaking church answer the purpose of its organization? We let facts answer. Since June 30th, 1885, there have been no accessions from the Holland population to other American churches, whereas several have already come back to us by certificate and others contemplate doing the same. From all sources our membership has increased in eleven months from 34 to 82, our Sunday-school from 40 to 160, the pastor's Bible class alone numbering 50 members. Our attendance on Sabbath is limited only by the size of the building we occupy. We can seat only 300. The house is filled at every service. Interested ones are forced to leave for want of accommodations every Sabbath evening. Our audiences are made up of those whose parents attend the Christian Reformed and Independent Churches, as well as the First Reformed, together with a goodly sprinkling of Americans, not of Holland descent. As Americanization advances among the foreign element of the population of this city, our movement will gain strength and support. Born of necessity, our future is a most hopeful one, and our prospects will brighten from year to year. We are enjoying a gratifying spiritual condition, we have the good will of all the other churches, and receive words of encouragement and substantial expressions of interest from many citizens.

3. Our temporalities and need. Our lease of the Unitarian Church expires in February, 1887—in the heart of winter. There is no prospect of renewal. The building is already too small and there is none obtainable that is more commodious. February, March and April are too cold to permit of open air meetings in the park or on the commons. There is but one alternative. We must build at once, so that we can occupy our own quarters at no later date than February, 1887.

Now this people are not afraid to dig. But by digging alone their present wants cannot be supplied. Their quota towards pastor's salary $400, rent of church and hall $350, sexton and incidentals $100, besides their subscription of $600 on a church site recently bought for a consideration of $2,500, are as heavy a burden as they can possibly lift in one year with the limited means they possess. Hence, though somewhat ashamed so to do, we are forced to beg. If we succeed in getting a church building, there is good reason to believe that within five years after it is paid for, this will be a strong, self-sustaining church. Present indications give assurance that it will soon cease to be a parasite and become a feeder to the Treasury of the Domestic Mission Board. But if we fail to get a church building by February, 1887, disintegration is possible and a stunted growth unavoidable. If, after the fashion of Chinese girls, our feet are bound and we obliged to go in pinched shoes now, we may go a tottering ever after, and our progress be seriously retarded.

The Second Reformed Church of Kalamazoo is an experiment. Our progress is watched with interest by Holland Reformed churches in several of the Western cities where the young are ready to make the transition from the Holland to the English language in their church worship. If we receive the encouragement of the Reformed Church in America and succeed, it is likely that our example will be followed elsewhere at no distant day. Thus our Reformed Church will have an opportunity as never before, and perhaps never after, to plant herself as an English-speaking Church in the cities of the West, where now she is scarcely known or recognized. Will she embrace these opportunities?

I appeal to pastors and churches, and Sunday schools and ladies' auxiliaries. If in view of facts mentioned you sympathize with our movement and would have us proceed at once to build, please answer by prompt and generous contributions.

A Modern Sir Galahad.

BY MARY R. BALDWIN.

CHAPTER IX.

"This love is of the brain, the mind, the soul:
That makes the sequel pure; tho' some of us
Beginning at the sequel know no more."

THE communion Sunday which had been long anticipated in Danton at last dawned. Many young hearts throbbed, for it was to be the consecration day, before the emblems of sacrifice and love, upon the distribution of which they had looked year by year, filled with awe and wonder. That the symbols seemed more important to some of them than that for which they stood should not be thought very strange. All of us are in a sense led by sight until we are able to walk by faith. Laurence Bowles had, through all the months of his faithful service, been sowing the seed of the Spirit. Not all of it fell on good ground; the stony places received some, and some seed, which for long years lay dormant, was watered and matured by other hands than his.

It was an auspicious day for Danton's First Church, and as the young and the middle-aged went forward together many an eye was dimmed with tears of joy, and many a prayer went up from grateful, earnest hearts, that the vows to be made before God and the angels might be regarded as sacred to life's very end.

Laurence Bowles was pale, and with the rapt Sir Galahad expression upon his face which made him seem like one who had seen what was "not lawful for men to utter." Never had he seemed to the church so worthy of worship as he did on this day when giving his charge to those whom he had so carefully and tenderly led on to their hour of public consecration to the will and service of their Master. In the minister's pew Miriam sat, unable to control her emotion. She felt that her husband was more out of the body than usual. She who had watched his moods through the months of their married life, observed a something in his look and manner which filled her with foreboding. The last verse of the closing hymn was sung:

"High heaven, that hears the solemn vow,
That vow renewed shall daily hear;
Till, in life's latest hour, I bow
And bless in death a bond so dear."

The minister, with marked emphasis, pronounced the benediction, and the eventful services were ended. Miriam passed quickly out. She could not have trusted her voice to utter a word. She went to her own room, removed her wrappings, fell upon her knees and cried from out her sore need, "Oh, God, save my husband from himself." She had forgotten her own especial weariness and want at thought of a possibility for one she was learning to love better than her own life.

She heard at last her husband's footsteps. Then she arose and met him with outstretched hands at the door. He had no word of welcome for her. He half-staggered to the lounge and fell upon it, closing his eyes. Miriam knelt beside him and passed her soft hand gently over his forehead. A minute of silence passed. Laurence then opened his eyes, and gazing upon his wife, said: "I am completely prostrated, dear wife. I cannot understand it. I never experienced anything like it before."

"Ah! my dear husband, this has been coming upon you for months. I have feared this hour. You have spent your force; now you must rest," she replied.

She sent a messenger to Squire Downs, asking him to call upon her at once. And when he came she told him that her husband would not be able to attend the evening meeting, and explained how worn he was with the long drain upon his sympathies and demand upon his every energy.

She did not, however, need to explain anything to the Squire, for he and "Polly" had expected just such a "giving out." Then the good Squire told her that he would lay the case before the church that evening, and arrange for a supply of two weeks, and send the minister and his wife up to Shoreton to get a little change of scene. Miriam could trust all to the wisdom and affection of Squire Downs, and she went back to her husband's side to tell him that Squire Downs would take charge of the evening meeting, and that the minister was not to make his appearance.

Laurence was so incapable of exertion of any kind that he made no objection, and even gave a sigh of relief

The next morning two of the church officials called to say to Mr. Bowles that the society wished their minister to go away for two months, and that they had already sent to a professor in the college over in the city to supply the pulpit. That very evening the minister and his wife started for Shoreton.

Janet was quite overjoyed at the great surprise. She took her darling to her heart at once; then she held her off and looked earnestly into the sweet face, then she gave a long sigh and whispered within herself, "Just as I knew it would be." She made up her mind in that minute never to allow her young mistress to leave her again. She determined to follow her to the end of her own poor life. And she carried her point, for when the minister, with recruited energies, returned with his wife to the place of his service, the loving, faithful Janet went with them. The experience of Sir Galahad in spending himself utterly had imposed upon Miriam a sense of a new duty of which she never more was to lose sight, and this was to try and help him to see that he was to hold his strength as sacred to the Lord's service; that his peculiar gift of sympathy was to be used for Him, and at the same time he was not to use his gifts and powers after the manner of a spendthrift. If she brought her Sir Galahad to recognize and to attain to a proper spiritual, mental and physical equilibrium, would she not bring him to seeming perfection? And would not her mission be of the highest?

As the summer came on Mrs. Marshall began to plan for the coming of Anise. She found her mother-heart yearning for her child again. The letters she had received from her were full of the delights and deeper meanings of the new life. At two separate times she had mentioned going with her cousin to a party and meeting Mr. Hyr there. "Oh, life is such a different thing here. I sometimes wish we lived here, and then I think I never could give up the dear old home rooms nor the forest."

The fond mother was very glad to learn that Anise was not spoiled by the sights and sounds of the city, as so many girls before had been. When at last her Anise came home for the vacation the mother's eyes could hardly trust their evidence, so astonished was she at the added beauty of her daughter's face. She did not guess the secret, and Anise could not have disclosed it.

The fulness of Tom Hyr's time had come. What he had suffered in the proving of love no one but himself knew. He had a cousin in Boston who was a society light, and through her he managed to meet at different entertainments the "floweret." She was not a neglected blossom; he trembled as he noticed this, but at last he began to console himself with a hope. He had watched the sweet eyes turn from an admirer to cast their appealing expression upon him. He always found an opportunity to call upon her after the party, to assure himself by the light of day that his hopes had not been vain dreams. When he went back to his own city he realized love's conditions everywhere. There was a certain picture in a window which he passed which always compelled him to stop before it—a little thing, half humor, half-pathos in its meaning—a little girl was standing, a daisy in her hands; under it was the words:

"I don't care what the daisy says,
I'm going to be married one of these days."

Whatever shadow fate might throw over Tom's hopes, he insisted to himself, "I'm going to be married one of these days." Sometimes it was quite natural that he should have his doubts. Saints doubt of reaching heaven when they realize most their own unworthiness of such blessedness.

When at last the fulness of time came, Tom went down to Danton. Mrs. Marshall was surprised to see the minister's friend, and when she had seated him in the parlor she said: "I suppose you expected to find the minister in town. He went to Shoreton for a two months' stay; went last week."

But Tom informed her that he had come on particular business of his own, and went straight to the point, after his own manly fashion.

"Well, I must say I'm surprised, and yet I might have known it. Anise had such a strange way when she spoke of meeting you in Boston. I'll go and call her," said the mother.

Poor Mrs. Marshall was glad to get away to her room to let the coming tears fall where no one could see them. At last she dried her eyes and went to her child's door. It was open and Anise was asleep She lay as she had often seen her in childhood, one hand under her cheek, her lips were parted, and a smile was about her sweet mouth.

"Anise," she said, as she touched the sleeper gently, "Mr. Hyr has come." The girl, half-awake, answered, "Yes, I know."

Again she touched her child and again said, "Mr. Hyr wants to see you." The girl sat up, looked at her mother in a bewildered way. The mother said again: "Mr. Hyr has come to see you."

The face was flooded with joy, and she rose, saying, "I will soon be ready." And the poor mother knew that she must part with her child.

"Dear little floweret!" Tom burst out as he went forward to meet her as she entered the parlor. "I have come to know my fate!" He got no further

"For words are weak
And most to seek
When wanted fifty-fold;
And then if silence will not speak,
And trembling lip and changing cheek,
There's nothing told."

These did not speak, therefore something was told—the old story which never is spent, never loses its power through the telling. An hour after Mrs. Marshall saw the two leave the yard together, and whispered to herself, "Well I never! if they both haven't that unearthly look!"

There was a long talk that evening after the betrothed ones returned, Mrs. Marshall insisting that Anise must not return to finish another term in Boston if Mr. Hyr insisted upon placing the wedding day among the next May days. But Tom thought that there was no need of making up an elaborate trousseau, and that Anise could leave school one week and be married the next. However, the mother gained her point when she spoke of having her child all to herself for a few months. The wedding plans being perfected, the conversation turned upon the minister and his wife. Tom was not surprised to hear that both began to show the effect of overwork, and that the wife had grown anxious and abstracted in manner. As we have seen, Tom was one who could never be so filled with his own interests that he could not find a place in his heart for those of his friend; and he felt troubled and sad that Laurence Bowles should sacrifice his wife unnecessarily to his church; he felt slightly remorseful, also, that he had himself advised the taking of a wife. It had not turned out as he had hoped, yet withal he held his hope that womanly love and tact and judgment would in the end prove powerful for the very best results.

Laurence Bowles came back to his people refreshed by his vacation; and his wife began to bear extra burdens to relieve him of overwork. In vain Janet pleaded with her to spare herself and "let the people take care of their own church a little and try to save their minister occasionally." Miriam, knowing all would fall upon her husband if she did not bear a share, gave herself up to the work. And she loved the service, but here and there, as again and again she saw the young converts still living upon the milk of the Word when strong meat should have been their nourishment, and felt that her own husband had too long coddled them through his large sympathies, she wondered that he could not tell them in forcible language that they were to seek the fountain-head. Her woman's instincts told her readily where these seekers failed, and suggested also to her faithful heart the unfruitful results of this draught upon the sympathy of the servant, instead of upon that of his Master. She had strong hope that in time her husband would settle to a proper basis of service; until then, she felt she must bear her part in the useless emptying out of the heart daily.

The spring was advancing toward the wedding day of Tom Hyr and Anise Marshall, when there came a night of peril to the parsonage—an hour when life and death were balanced. Laurence Bowles walked up and down his study, helpless with his heart burden. At last the door opened and Mrs. Downs entered softly, and laid her motherly hand upon his shoulder. "She wants you, Mr. Bowles, your wife is calling for you!"

"Will she live?" he cried, as he grasped the hand of the messenger. "The doctor says she will live. But you must be calm. You must not wear that terrible look. It will frighten her."

Laurence Bowles followed Mrs. Downs into his wife's room. He went softly to the bedside; he looked down at the pale, worn features; he laid his hand lightly upon the smooth brow; he whispered, "Miriam."

The tired eyelids slowly lifted themselves; the eyes of the dear one who, it seemed, had been brought back from another world, rested upon his face once more with a look of love. Laurence bent low over the dear face and whispered only, "Oh, my darling!"

Mrs. Downs led him to the next room, and removing a snowy covering showed him the form of his son—his first born, from which the soul had flown.

"He gave one little sigh and was gone," Mrs. Downs explained. And Laurence Bowles went back to his study to bear this first grief without the help of her who had been so careful to bear, even to death's door, his burdens.

Before Mrs. Downs left the parsonage she had a long, earnest, private talk with her minister, and through its influence Laurence Bowles saw in many respects his duty to his church and his duty to his wife change places. Not that he became untrue to his consecration vow, or esteemed his Master's service of less account, but he seemed to better comprehend the truth in the words, "These ought ye to have done, and not have left the other undone."

The wedding day dawned at last, and the church was filled with interested and curious ones to witness the marriage of Anise Marshall with the "city young man." When Laurence Bowles, who officiated at his friend's marriage, offered his little after-speech, as was the custom then, he seemed like one inspired as he charged the bridegroom to tenderly cherish his bride. Tom himself did not remember one word of the charge, and although he noticed a something peculiar in Sir Galahad's expression, he did not speculate upon it. His thoughts were busy trying to realize the fulfilment of his own hopes, and as he passed to the outer air he could have shouted to nature, "The 'floweret' is won at last!" However, he did nothing of the kind, only after he was seated by his wife he whispered, "Mine at last!"

The wedding guests had departed, except Tom's sister Gracie, when the married lovers went over to the parsonage to say "good-by" to their friends. Miriam, though fast gaining her strength and spirits under the lover like treatment of her husband, had not been able to witness the marriage service. Tom said to his friend; "Your wife is a delicate blossom, Laurence; you chose well; she is very lovely!"

"But Tom," replied the minister, "I have just learned how to guard her." And there was a look in his Sir Galahad eyes that Tom, perhaps for want of a better word, afterwards called "a human look."

Thoughts About Prohibition.

1. PROHIBITION does not prohibit. Hear the testimony of its friends. In Maine the law has been on the statute book for many years. Yet (1) where the magistrates are intent on enforcing it, it is still habitually violated in a small and mean way by trick. The tricks are discovered, but as soon as one is found out, another is invented. And (2) where the magistrates do not enforce the law, drinking goes on as elsewhere. But (3.) in either case, when a club of men, young or old, import liquor in the original package and consume it at their meetings, there is nothing to hinder. Hence it is clear that prohibition as a fact does not exist. All that the law accomplishes is to restrict. And it is an open question whether there are not better ways of restriction.

2. No political party founded on a single principle has ever permanently succeeded in this country. Witness, the Anti-Masonic movement, the Native American, and the Anti-Slavery. The Republican party is only an apparent exception, for that in its development arrayed one-half of the country against the other on the question whether slavery should be extended into new territories and States. This issue, although seemingly one and simple, yet involved a great variety of interests, civil, political, social and commercial.

3. A political party based on a moral issue is sure to be degraded. It attracts the scallywags of the other parties, is used for personal ends, and at last perishes with none to mourn over it. Politics, like misery, makes strange bedfellows. Statemanship is said to be the science of compromises, and this is still more true of politics. Good men come into contact with those who are not good, but who happen to agree with them on a single point, and gradually they are drawn into methods and practices from which they once would have recoiled in dismay. It is now more than fifty years since at divers times and places political action has been sought in aid of total abstinence, and invariably with the result of lowering the moral tone of those who resorted to it. In the ardent pursuit of the end held in view they resort to means that are questionable, if not worse. Personalities, fallacies, misrepresentations, impeachments of motives, and the usual vulgarities of a partizan press take the place of calm reason and the moderation which attends the consciousness of assured truth.

4. The great stress laid upon a prohibitory law lessens the attention given to moral influences, and turns men's thoughts from the only true and lasting reform which proceeds from within outwardly to an external force which operates mechanically and from without. The closing of saloons merely lessens the temptations and facilities for intemperance, but leaves the appetite untouched. And there is no small reason to fear that the closing of one means of gratifying men's thirst for stimulants only leads to the resort to stimulants of another kind. The sales of opium by many country druggists are of an amount that suggests a frightful use of this means of intoxication. How much better is the course which appeals to the man himself, seeks to free him from his debasing habit, and make him the master and not the slave of his appetites and propensities? Little dependence is to be placed upon those habits which rest merely upon the absence of facilities for indulgence. What is needed is a renovation of heart and character which is independent of outward circumstances and can be relied upon anywhere. Whatever falls short of this is a delusion and a snare.

The Labor Question.

DEAR INTELLIGENCER: I have read with interest your recent articles on the labor question, and while admiring the temperateness of their tone and the evident desire to do justice to both sides of the question, there are some things to which I cannot agree.

It is perfectly proper that the artisan and the laborer should combine in associations or guilds for their mutual benefit and protection, but when such associations say to their members, "You shall not work alongside of men not members of the association," they become vehicles of oppression, if not of their own members, of those who do not belong to the society, and exceed their proper function. But I do not consider the Knights of Labor such an organization. Whatever may be the present objects of that Association, and however judicious and upright Mr. Powderly may be,—and we all admire the position he has taken in the late strife and his evident sincere desire to improve the condition of the workingman,—the ultimate end and result of that Association will be an aristocracy (so to speak) of the employed crushing the unemployed; for if I rightly understand, one of the qualifications for membership is that the applicant shall be employed. Now if the writer in one of the daily papers recently is right in his statistics, there are in the United States, unemployed or having only occasional employment, 800,000 unskilled laborers, as against 500,000 having steady employment. What, then, is this Association at the present time but a banding together of the employed against the unemployed? What is it really but creating a "caste," a thing as foreign to the genius of our government as any thing can be. This must be the necessary result: if the unemployed cannot get work they cannot contribute to the funds of the society, which not only does not propose, as I understand, to maintain the unfortunate, but says to its members, you shall not work alongside of such an one if he should chance to get employment.

You speak of associations of employers. Are such things ever heard of, have they ever been heard of in our land before the combinations of the employed made them necessary? No, capital is not coöperative, it is essentially competitive. Where is there an instance that the production of an article profitably does not lead to the establishment of another or many mills or factories to produce the same thing? Where is there a railroad that has proved productive to the projectors that has not been paralleled? and in some instances by so many new lines that none of them can earn anything.

There is no conflict between labor and capital; it is a mistaken way of stating the question. The conflict is between greed and struggling humanity, and the remedy is not strikes, riot and incendiarism, but arbitration. Capital and labor one co-dependent; one is useless without the other. Capital is essentially the friend and promoter of invention, and invention has done more for the laborer in lessening the hours of drudgery and toil than it has in cheapening the articles he consumes.

I have taken more of your space than I intended, and may allude to some other points at a subsequent time, if acceptable.

FAIR PLAY.

A Circular Letter and Results.

THE writer of the circular letter addressed to the ministers and churches takes this method to thank the Stated Clerks of the Classes for their kind, prompt and full replies to the "postal" asking for a corrected list of changes in the pastorates in each Classis. Whatever success may attend the appeal, these brethren have assisted in bringing about the result. By the help thus afforded a circular has been addressed to every pastor in the denomination. In addition to this, a special letter was enclosed to an elder of every "vacant" church, and another to every minister without charge.

In the five days that passed after the circular was sent, a large number of answers were received, all heartily endorsing the plan. In three days more than fifty dollars were received or promised from "ministers without charge" who have taken shares for themselves and families. These shares, from ministers without charge, are to be designated as "The Ministers' Fund for the Debt."

Let no one feel any embarrassment in subscribing because he can take only one or two shares. If each member of the family takes one share the conditions of the plan are complied with.

Many pastors may urge that the plan of receiving a subscription from each one, if carried out, will cause them a great amount of trouble and work. If the suggestions of the circular are followed there will be little or no trouble, and the work can be done in three days.

A united effort now, as proposed, would bring in sufficient to place both of our Missionary Boards out of debt. Our mission work, foreign and domestic, is one, and deserves our support. The debt is not the debt of the brethren composing the Board of Missions, but my debt, your debt, fellow Christian. These brethren are carrying it for us, and are often harassed on every side to find ways and means to keep our work from bankruptcy.

Let us all now subscribe our proportion of shares, and begin the year without debt.

The United Society of Christian Endeavor.

THE Fifth Annual Conference of the Societies of Christian Endeavor will be held at Saratoga Springs on July 6, 7, and 8 next. Arrangements have been made by which board can be obtained at many of the best houses for from one to two dollars a day. A list of the houses can be had from the General Secretary, George M. Ward, Box 1,235, Boston, Mass., from whom also can be obtained a programme of the Conference.

The Reading Room.

Our Book-Shelves.

....“THE RAILWAYS AND THE REPUBLIC.” By James F. Hudson. Mr. Hudson has written an important and valuable book. It has great excellences and evident faults. The first chapter, from some cause not easy to define, is a very tough piece of reading. The reader can without injury begin with the second chapter and, after reaching the end of the volume, turn back and read the first. There is much repetition in the book, which could have been avoided.

The author exposes fairly and in detail the injurious domination of the railways over various and important interests. The first chapter states the problem; the second and third enumerate the disastrous influence on localities and on separate manufactories and on the business of individuals of unjust discriminating rates and relations—the signal instance being the special privileges given to the Standard Oil Company, considered here as a “Commercial Crime.” In the fourth chapter, one of power, it is shown how the railways have attempted to overthrow fundamental principles of the common law and have nullified even State Constitutions, and this theme is continued in the next chapter under the title, Public Obligations and Corporate Practices. A succeeding chapter describes how the Pooling Policy has been wielded to destroy competition, another how capital has been inflated, and another contrasts with force and clearness competition and combination. The Discussion of Remedies traverses the field of legal rights and powers very thoroughly. A chapter is given to the consideration of the question whether, under certain regulations, individuals or companies of individuals shall not run trains on such public highways as railroads. The last chapter exposes the pernicious influence of Corporations in Politics and the perils attending it.

The treatment of the theme is thorough and intelligent, and while decided and earnest is not censorious or vituperative. A great and threatening public evil is exposed as it deserves, and the exposure ought to receive general attention. (Harper & Brothers.)

....“MASSACRES OF THE MOUNTAINS. A History of the Indian Wars of the Far West.” By J. P. Dunn, Jr., M.S., LL.B. The Indian wars of the Far West as they are described in this volume, and in government reports and other documents, illustrate far more the shame than the glory of the United States. No one can read this carefully prepared octavo without indignation at the confessed wrongs and provocations of the Indians, mingled with righteous resentment for the useless bloodshed and enormous cost of these continual conflicts, and with admiration of the courage and sacrifices of our heroic officers and soldiers. Mr. Dunn also sets forth in strong colors the various policies pursued by government in dealing with the savage tribes. He disapproves strongly of the policy of concentration or consolidation and forced removal of tribes from one reservation to another, and approves heartily of the Board of Indian Commissioners, although it has as yet barely checked the wrongs of which the Indians complain. “Let us be honest and fair with the Indian, and temper our justice with religion and education.” Upon this principle the history is a sad commentary and a suggestive expositor. The book is profusely illustrated with wood-cuts of scenery, portraits and many other things related in the narrative. It is handsomely printed and bound, and is of permanent value. (Harper & Brothers.)

....“THE MIDGE.” By H. C. Bunner. No one can read this story without interest. It treats New York as Dickens treated London, describing the life of back streets and tenement houses in a most striking way. The story is of a waif thrown on the care of a benevolent bachelor, living somewhere west and south of Washington Square. The picture is drawn with fine artistic touches in every part, and the impression is such as reality brings. The ending is somewhat disappointing, yet such as only a strong writer would give. We commend the book as a powerful sketch well worth the reading. (Charles Scribner's Sons.)

....“PROBATION AND PUNISHMENT.” By Rev. S. M. Vernon, D.D. A plain, earnest, outspoken and yet tender and discriminating exposition of the Scriptural teaching respecting the future state of the wicked. The author's conclusion in regard to a “second probation” is that it is “inconsistent with reason, destructive to the highest moral and religious influence, and instead of proving a way of escape, is rather a delusion and a snare to the souls of men;” it is “without Biblical support and in hopeless antagonism with the whole drift of Scripture teaching.”

A prominent and impressive characteristic of the work is the strong argument to prove that love demands the punishment of transgression, that mercy cannot connive at unrighteousness.

As to the duration of future punishment, he holds that its “endlessness is seen in the meaning of the terms employed in the Bible, in the circumstances of the announcement of the doctrine, and in the necessities of the general system of revealed truth of which it forms a part.” The book is for general readers, in popular style, and with sufficient learning to command respect for its argument and conclusions. (J. B. Lippincott & Co.)

....Two more volumes of “TALES FROM MANY SOURCES” (V. and VI.) have been published by Dodd, Mead & Co., and are as choice as the previous volumes. The conscientiousness of the editor in selecting stories for their intrinsic merit, and not for the commercial value of the authors' names, is indicated by the fact that the majority of them are not from the pens of writers who happen to be “the rage;” and a number of the best are anonymous, and credited only to the magazine in which they appeared. Care has also been taken not to admit hackneyed stories, though one, “My First Client,” by Hugh Conway, in Vol. VI., has been printed in several cheap serials in this country. It is a luxury to read the large, clear type of these tasteful books. We are disposed to pronounce this series of short stories superior to any other, even the classic “Tales from Blackwood.”

....“FIRST HEALING AND THEN SERVICE, and Other Sermons.” Preached in 1885, by C. H. Spurgeon, of London. This volume of seventeen sermons by the famous London preacher is the peer of those previously published. His later discourses have all the originality and vigor, and more maturity of thought and experience than his earlier, though they were never lacking in these respects. The practical character of these sermons is indicated by the theme of the first one, which has been appropriated as the title of the volume. The series properly concludes with “Jubilate,” as after service comes song. (Robert Carter & Bros.)

....“A VICTORIOUS DEFEAT.” By Wolcott Balestier. This is more than an ordinary story. It is a careful study and presentation of the social and ecclesiastical life of the Moravians in the Pennsylvania settlement. The struggle by which one of their ministers conquers self is finely drawn out, and the love scenes are fairly told. But the chief interest lies in the description of the rules and customs of the quaint people who seem like a fragment of the seventeenth century set in the life of this bustling age. All who have ever visited Bethlehem will find well known scenes brought before them, and will be led to recall pleasantly the elders, brethren and sisters of the United Brethren in the peculiarities which have been so long retained. The author is to be congratulated on having done his work so well, and the book, we doubt not, will secure the attention of a large circle of readers. (Harper & Bros.)

....“MOMENTS ON THE MOUNT.” By Rev. George Matheson, D.D. This series of devotional meditations is not only marked by deep spirituality, but also by great thoughtfulness, and in the latter particular it is far in advance of most works of its class. It is eminently suggestive, is rich in seed-thoughts, and even when, as in a very few instances, one dissents from the author's interpretations of Scripture as fanciful and unnatural, the thought he suggests will be found worthy of consideration.

The meditations are short—two or three pages each—and cover a wide range of topics. (A. C. Armstrong & Son.)

....“HELEN; or, Will She Save Him?” By Mrs. Sarah M. Perkins. A Temperance Story by the “National Organizer” for the Women's Christian Temperance Union. The moral of the book is found in Helen's dearly bought experience, which many a young woman needs to learn—“Never marry a man who drinks even moderately, expecting that your influence will reform him. Nothing but the grace of God can change an unholy appetite.” This story is but one of the oft-repeated tales of woman's sufferings and heroic love in the drunkard's home, and of the final victory of Divine power. (Funk & Wagnalls.)

....“WALTER HARMSEN. A Tale of Reformation Times in Holland.” By E. Gerdes. Translated from the Dutch by Rev. Daniel Van Pelt. The readers of the INTELLIGENCER have been made familiar with the portion of this story which has appeared serially in its columns. To adapt it for general use in this country the translator has added one original chapter and a part of another, embracing historical details, which make the situations more clear to American readers. The tale includes events and characters connected with “the Churches under the Cross” from their beginnings to their establishment in the State Church after the great conflict for civil and religious liberty was ended. Mr. Van Pelt has done well in giving this interesting story its English dress. The narrative is vividly drawn and the translation is spirited and strong. It will make an excellent addition to any Sunday-school library. (Presbyterian Board of Publication.)

....“ALDEN'S CYCLOPEDIA OF UNIVERSAL LITERATURE,” Vol. II., is a convenient popular handbook of information, combining biographical and critical notices of eminent authors, with specimens of their writings in prose and poetry. The arrangement of authors is alphabetical, and the volume extends from T. S. Arthur to Matteo Boiardo.

....An interesting historical tale by Thomas Archer appears under the title of “BY FIRE AND SWORD: A Story of the Huguenots.” Beside being instructive, it is quite cleverly written, and holds throughout the close attention of the reader. (Cassell & Co.)

Our Library Table.

Periodicals, Serials and Notes.

....In Harper's Magazine for June, the short serial by the author of “John Halifax” is brought to a close. It is a very beautiful story. Mr. Curtis's humor and delicacy of touch never were more delightful than in this session of the “Easy Chair.” The barbarism of the prevailing millinery has nowhere been so trenchantly attacked as in “The Dead Bird upon Cyrilla's Hat.” Mr. Howells, in the “Editor's Study,” has some just remarks on the Concord-School Lectures on Goethe, pronouncing them “an insufficient study, ignoring the faults and obliquities of the celebrated master.” “Through Cumberland Gap on Horseback” is a gem of illustration. The educational articles of the month are “The United States Navy” and “A Lump of Sugar” (No. 5 of “Great American Industries”). Annie Porter contributes a story founded on a trance mistaken for death, and Prof. T. F. Crane a careful historical study of the real facts relating to the death of Pope Alexander VI. The poems of Rev. M. J. Savage and of Col. J. W. Deforest are better than the average of the Harper muse. The serials of Blackmore, Roe and Warner are continued.

....The Expositor for May contains the temperate reply of Capt. Conder to Socin's Criticisms on the Palestine Exploration Fund's work, Canon Kirkpatrick's notice of the Revision of Second Samuel, and an acute discussion of the question of Testament or Covenant in Hebrews 9:16, 17. It also continues Marcus Dod's prelections on Zechariah and Dr. McLaren's admirable exposition of Colossians. It concludes with a review of recent Foreign Literature on the New Testament by Prof. Salmond.

The Christian Jews in Russia.

THE movement led by Rabinowitsch in Bessarabia, Southern Russia, continues to advance. There is now a large congregation in Kischinew, and the influence of the preaching is extending to other localities. The articles of faith have recently been rendered into English and made public, and are these:

1. I believe with an unwavering faith that our Father in Heaven is the living, true, and eternal God, who has created the heaven and the earth and all things visible and invisible through His Word and His Holy Spirit. He is One; all things are from Him, and all things are in Him, and all things are to Him.

2. I believe with an unwavering faith that our Father in Heaven, in accordance with His promises given to our father, our prophets, and our King David, the son of Jesse, has awakened for Israel a Redeemer—namely, Jesus, who was born of Mary the Virgin, in the city of Bethlehem, of Judea, who suffered, was crucified, died, and was buried for our salvation; who arose again from the dead and lives, and behold He is sitting at the right hand of our Father in Heaven, and will come from there to judge the circuit of the earth, the living and the dead, and He is King over the house of Jacob forever, and His kingdom knows no end.

3. I believe with an unwavering faith that, according to the determination of God to pass judgment, and His foreknowledge, our fathers were stricken with hardness of heart, that they blasphemously resisted the Messiah, the Lord Jesus, in order to arouse the other nations of the earth to all the greater zeal, and to reconcile them all through their faith in Christ, according to the words of His evangelists, in order that the earth should be full of the knowledge of the Lord, and that the Lord should be King over the whole earth.

4. I believe with an unwavering faith that only through faith in Jesus, the Messiah, any man can be justified, without the works of the law, and that there is one God, who, through faith, justifies the circumcised Jews and the uncircumcised Gentiles, and that there is no difference between Jews and Greeks, servants and freemen, man and woman; they are all one in Christ.

5. I believe with an unwavering faith in one holy Apostolic Church.

6. I confess one baptism unto the forgiveness of sin.

7. I wait for the resurrection and the recalling of the dead unto everlasting life. Amen.

THE SABBATH IN ITALY.—The Italian Chamber has passed a law making one day's rest per week, by children working in factories, obligatory. This concession is due in great measure to the continued efforts of Pastor Sciarrelli, the agent of the Wesleyan Mission at Naples. He succeeded in obtaining the support of the Hygienic Society, and several workingmen's societies.

FIRST FRUITS IN COREA.—After two years' labor at Seoul, the capital, a colporteur has seventy men who are applicants for baptism; in a city in the south there are more than twenty, and in a place at the west eighteen. These first fruits are most encouraging for the future of the Gospel in Corea.... The Chinese Recorder states that Rev. J. R. Wolfe of the Church Missionary Society, with two Chinese Christians sent out by the Foochow Church, sailed from Shanghai, November 1st, to begin a thoroughly Chinese mission in Corea. Mr. Ah Hok, a wealthy Chinese Christian, gave one thousand dollars to start this mission, and went with them to Corea to help settle them in the work.

AUNT MARJORIE'S CORNER

Both Prayer and Benediction.

BY MARY R. BALDWIN.

THE article in "Aunt Marjorie's Corner," entitled "Fugitive Poetry," is one of that kind which appeals so directly to the reason and sentiment that we whisper, "I meant to write such an article, and would, if possible, have written the same things." It is recorded that a youth once sent Emerson some verses, and the sage said of them, "They have truth and earnestness, and a happier hour may add that external something which can neither be commanded nor described." On reading this reply, it seemed as if there had been a misprint—that external should read internal—for it surely would best refer to that something "neither to be commanded nor described" which gives poetry a passport to the heart.

The fable runs that Minerva rose in full armor out of the brain of Jupiter, and the poetry which wakens man's most intense sensibilities must not seem to have the thought carefully measured for its clothes, but it must have been born in its clothes, as it were. It is this sort of poem that appeals to our highest and finest instincts and haunts us though days and years.

Examining "Poems of the Household," and like a child who wanders along the beach strewn with bright shells, stopping to possess ourselves of each shining thing—not knowing that we shall have our apron more than full before the end is reached—we come to "Common Days," the last verse of which reads:

"God keep us through the common days,
The level stretches white with dust,
When thought is tired, and hands upraise
Their burdens freely, since they must.
In days of slowly fretting care
Then most we need the strength of prayer."

Who has not felt the need of help for these "level stretches white with dust?" The writer, through a certain subtle something in this line, proves that she understands the trial of these monotonous days, which are harder to meet sometimes than a real shock, because they seem to fetter purpose and dull spiritual vision. She does not, however, picture graphically the uninspired hours without offering a help for them, and this is the "strength of prayer."

Repeating this verse to one who was fainting under the monotony of every-day burden-bearing, we saw a something steal over the care-worn face that showed that the poet's mission was something more than an appeal to the sense of harmony—that it comprehended the yearning cry of a needy soul—and offered a benediction. Another friend, to whom the same volume was lent, remarked, "I never realized until reading these, what a sweet restfulness could be gained from poems."

There is one poem from the pen of Susan Coolidge in which the thought and the rhythm are married, and which is so full of that restful quality that it seems to yield itself to the need of the reader; it is entitled "When?" The last of it reads:

"Thou can'st not come too soon,
And I can wait
If thou come late."

We seem through the verse to feel that the last change is not death; it is the coming rather, of the Lord to us. If these two writers had given the world nothing beside these poems which have been referred to, they would have accomplished much.

There is a song that even while I write pursues me, and seems to be insisting upon a place upon my page. It is that entitled "The Song of the Camp," written by Bayard Taylor; and though not possessing the peculiar qualities of the ones quoted, has a power in its exaltation of man's finest instincts. I cannot refrain from presenting a few verses of it:

"There was a pause. The guardsman said
'We storm the forts to-morrow—
Sing while we may, another day
Will bring enough of sorrow!'

"They lay along the battery's side,
Below the smoking cannon—
Brave hearts from Severn and from Clyde,
And from the banks of Shannon.

"They sung of love and not of fame,
Forgot was Britain's glory;
Each heart recalled a different name,
But all sang 'Annie Laurie.'

"Voice after voice caught up the song,
Until its tender passion
Rose like an anthem, rich and strong,—
Their battle-eve confession.

. . . . . .

"Oh, soldiers! to your honored rest,
Your truth and valor bearing,—
The bravest are the tenderest,
The loving are the daring."

We all need to rise occasionally out of the grind of life's daily cares, and if, as some have claimed, we each have a poetic yearning within us, why not allow the spirit to be bathed and cooled at the fountain kept perennial by the magic of one who has been poetically inspired?

In the Retrospect.

WE regret that this pleasant letter came too late for insertion last week, but our readers will enjoy it even at this date.

DEAR AUNT MARJORIE: With a heart brimful and bubbling over with enthusiasm, induced by a participation in the anniversary exercises of the Woman's Missionary Boards, held in the Collegiate Church, 5th avenue, May 11th, I can think of no better way to subdue, or at least control the ebullition, than by using my pen to transmit to you some "of the abundance of the heart" from which the "mouth" is wont to speak. Everything was delightful! From the soft, sweet face of the venerable "elect lady," about whose brow clustered so beautifully the "almond" blossom, and whose silent presence seemed an inspiration, to the sprightly maiden around whose youthful head twined the graceful wistaria, (adorning it only as the unique setting adorns the sparkling gem it surrounds,) while she "ministered to the saints" with "ready hands and willing feet;" from "the feast of reason and the flow of soul," to the dainty sandwiches and delicious coffee (whose rich aroma served to whet anew appetites already well sharpened by miles of travel), provided by the generous hospitality of the members of the Boards; from the glad strains of sacred music that came floating down upon the assembly as a gentle benediction, to the exquisite perfume of flowers, pervading the very air of God's temple with a subtle fragrance that scarcely seemed of the earth; from the torrent of eloquence that came rushing with the impetuosity of the rapids of Niagara from the lips of him who evidently "spoke that he knew," and felt burned into his very soul, and the stimulating, encouraging words of the young "ambassador for Christ," who is proving himself such a noble example of judicious home training, to the earnest, thrilling, suggestive words so touchingly and impressively spoken by our dear sisters of another denomination, separated from us only by a wall so low that no effort is necessary in order to step over it—all so eminently calculated to deepen a missionary spirit in the churches and bring forth fruit to the honor and glory of God. To me the day was one of rare enjoyment. I met so many of whom a knowledge had come to me "by the hearing of the ear," or through the printed page only, and I rejoiced in the ability to say of such, "now mine eye seeth thee." It felt to me like the happy meeting of the children of one household, of which God is the loving Father and Christ is the dear elder Brother, and it required little effort of the imagination to trace the family likeness in each face. God grant there may go forth from this anniversary occasion an influence for good that shall widen and deepen until the narrow stream of time is lost in the boundless ocean of eternity!

FRESH from our Foreign Mission Anniversary we shall all the more deeply enjoy whatever brings remote fields near us. The little article here quoted is from the Japan Gazette of April 16th, 1886:

At 6 P.M. on the 15th instant, the Rev. Yamamoto Hidetaru and Miss Sakabe Sato were married at the Union Church, Yokohama. Mr. Yamamoto, is at present acting as pastor of the Nakajima-cho Kio-kwai in Kochi, province of Tosa, and has until recently been engaged in the department of Chinese and English instruction in the Ferris Seminary at this place. Miss Sakabe is one of the graduates and teachers of the Women's Union Mission School, No. 212, Bluff. She has been regarded as one of the prettiest and most proficient of the many excellent young ladies in that institution, and Mr. Yamamoto is certainly to be congratulated on the acquisition of so desirable a helpmate. The ceremony was in foreign style, though conducted in the Japanese language. It was performed by the Rev. Dr. Amerman, of Tokyo, assisted by the bride's pastor, the Rev. Inagaki Akira. W. Oram, Esq., presided at the organ. The bride and bridegroom were dressed in faultless Japanese style, while many of their friends, in addition to the ushers, wore foreign dress suits. Numbers of the young ladies present were handsomely dressed in lilac colored crapes, and had white flowers in their glossy black hair; they also wore white kid gloves. The altar was beautifully decorated with flowers in which white and pink camelia on dark evergreens were abundantly displayed, together with the never failing plum and cherry blossoms, without which, at this season of the year, no floral display would be complete in Japan. The bright head dresses of the young ladies of the schools also lent an additional charm to the scene. The large church was well filled with the many friends of the young couple, who, after the completion of the ceremony, were invited to the Women's Union Mission Home, No. 212, Bluff, where together with a large party of the friends of the bride and bridegroom, who had arrived from the capital and elsewhere, they enjoyed a most pleasant evening, which was spent in games, refreshment, singing, and viewing the presents received by the newly married couple. The latter are expected to set out immediately to the scene of the husband's field of labor, and the best wishes of their many friends will certainly follow them.

A Bit of Plain Prose.

MORE than we are willing to believe, judging from our practice, daily happiness depends upon trifles. Little attentions, lovingly paid, kind words spoken, the absence of petty jealousies and the repression of censorious criticism have much to do with the comfort of those at home. Few of us are happy when we are uncomfortable in body or spirit. The fretting of uncongenial company, the constant need to be on guard lest we shall affront somebody who is on the lookout for slights, and the conviction that we are on trial and are not approved of, are enough to make us, if we are in the least sensitive, very miserable indeed.

Coming to the plain prose of everyday life, it seems a smaller matter than it is in reality to consult individual preferences about food, to see that the roast beef is so cooked that Samuel shall have his slice rare, and Matilda be accommodated with hers well done; that the salad shall be dressed to perfection, and the gravy appetizingly browned, while the three meals a day shall be three separate feasts to the palate, and social delights to the family. It is a slight thing and very likely is taken for granted, like the rising of the sun, in the fortunate household where it is the rule and not the exception, to obtain, if needful, a dainty luncheon at five minutes' notice. Anybody may serve an impromptu repast, you observe with indifference, yet, when you consider, you see that an impromptu meal implies resources; something left over for an emergency and easily put into shape, infers good management and a well-regulated commissary department, as regular breakfasts and dinners do not. Particularly if the home be several miles from a market, and not, as our city homes are, a stone's throw from fishmonger, butcher and baker, the lady of the house is entitled to appreciation if one is certain to receive food when hungry, at her hands.

Inveigh as we may against the habit of eating between meals and at odd times, there is a charm to most of us in a bit of cake and a glass of milk, or a cracker and a cup of tea in the middle of the morning or at four o'clock, enough to whet the edge of appetite and restore flagging energies, but not enough to do away with the need for the next meal. How sociable we grow over the unexpected cup of tea. Something to sip and to stir; its fragrant aroma pleases a refined taste and its presence loosens reluctant tongues, so that we grow confidential as we chat. Whoever chooses may be severely virtuous, and compel her child to wait "till he comes to the table," but my boy, returning from school, mid-afternoon, with a school boy's hollow vacuum imploring to be filled, shall have either the freedom of the pantry, or a properly prepared luncheon to await his attack. I shall not fear its giving him dyspepsia if he go cheerfully, as a schoolboy ought, on my numerous errands, and take the exercise a boy should among his mates.

Some one in the family is "fussy" with regard to cuffs and collars and cannot be contented unless they are as white as snow and as stiff as a board. Very well. See that they are stiff and white, and remove every cause of dissatisfaction. It is much less trouble to do this than to listen to continual complaints, and the advantage is, that if you are satisfied that the complaint is merely querulous habit and not warranted by any reasonable ground, you may then "kindly but firmly" assert your authority and require the complainer to cease disturbing the peace. An ounce of prevention first, however, is dictated by common sense.

Sweeter than Honey.

"The law of the Lord is perfect....sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb."—PSALM 19:7-10.

ONE of my boy friends made me a pleasant call this morning and brought me a sweet gift—some delicious maple sugar. I had been reading: "When Jewish boys in the East are first brought to school, at the age of four or five years, the Pentateuch is opened, and a piece of sugar or sweet cake is placed upon it. The child is then told that the law is sweeter than honey and the honeycomb."

The Pentateuch contains the first five books of the Old Testament. Pentateuch is a Greek word, made up of two others: Pente, five, and teuchos, a book. These five books contain the law which God gave to His people, the Israelites, by Moses. The little Jewish boys were to find sweetness in it, as they found sweetness in the honey and the honeycomb, and as "the little busy bee" finds sweetness in the flower.

"Little is the bee that hovers,
With its tiny wings and feet,
Lighting not till it discovers
Where the blossom hides its sweet."

I think these schoolmasters in the East are very wise. Should I ever teach school I am sure I would imitate them. My grandmother did when she taught one of her little grandsons to read. Why, you would have been surprised to have seen him run from his play to grandma's side when lesson-time came! Carefully and contentedly he pronounced the letters of our alphabet, and then the words they spelled. "Now, grandma!" was his exclamation as the book closed, and joyfully he bounded off as her word of command was given: "Go to my bureau drawer!" O what hidden sweets were there! candies and other good things that would have delighted your eyes!

Very soon this little grandson learned to read, and then, to find more sweetness in the book than in the bureau drawer. Now, he would far rather have the knowledge of the law of God than to enjoy the pleasure which comes to us while partaking of things which are sweet and delicious to our taste; but he can enjoy both, you know, and so can you and I.

"This maple sugar," said my young friend Silas this morning, "has come from central New York, and has been prepared by a new process." He did not tell me about the new process, but I can tell you a little about the old one.

Maple sugar, you probably all know, is made from the sap of the sugar-maple tree of North America. There are said to be more than sixty species of maple trees in different parts of the world; but the sap of the sugar-maple contains more sugar than the juices of all the other maples. To obtain the sugar holes are bored in the trunk,—at first half an inch deep, afterward an inch and a half deeper, not very far above the ground. This is done early in the spring, before the winter frost is gone. The sap is then ascending. The holes are bored upward, and in twenty-four hours a barrel of sap can be obtained from a tree six feet in diameter. One tree will give from twelve to twenty-four gallons in a season, or three to six pounds of sugar. The sap collected is placed in boilers over a brisk fire, and the syrup thus obtained is strained and run into moulds to form cakes. The work is done under sheds erected in the woods where the sugar-maples grow.

Whenever you eat maple sugar or honey I will want you to remember our little Bible sentence: "The law of the Lord is perfect....sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb." Sweet above all sweetest things!

Our dear Lord Jesus loved the law of God. It was very sweet to Him. He came into our world to obey it. One day a lawyer asked Him: "Master, which is the great commandment in the law?" Jesus said unto him: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets." He told the lawyer if he should obey these two laws of love he would do all that God asked him to do. Now these are very sweet laws, and Jesus, by perfectly obeying them, has shown us how sweet is the life which is one of love to God and love to one another. He was "altogether lovely," and the only way in which we can be lovely, too, is by finding such sweetness in God's holy law of love, as to desire to have it not only in our Bibles, but in our memories, so that we can say to our heavenly Father: "Oh, how love I Thy law! it is my meditation (what I think of) all the day."

"Saviour! teach me day by day
Love's sweet lesson to obey;
Sweeter lesson cannot be,
Loving Him who first loved me.

"With a childlike heart of love
At Thy bidding may I move;
Prompt to serve and follow Thee,
Loving Him who first loved me."

How a King Learned Kindness.

A CERTAIN king in the East was noted for his cruelty, so that he was much more dreaded than loved by his people. One day, after he had been out hunting and returned, he caused an officer to publish that he, the king, was now sensible of his faults, and henceforth meant to rule his subjects with justice and gentleness. He kept his promise so faithfully that they gave him the surname of The Just. Some years afterward, one of his favorite ministers took occasion to ask him what had so soon brought about that great change in his conduct. The king, with much kindness, thus explained it:

"You may remember I had been out to hunt just before making the public promise of better government. One of the dogs strayed from the pack to chase a fox, and bit him through the bone of the leg. The poor fox went limping to his hole, and the dog set off at full speed to rejoin the pack. One of my footmen wantonly threw stones at the dog, and broke his leg. A runaway horse, passing by at the time, mistook the motion of the man's arm for an attempt to catch him, and therefore kicked out and broke the footman's leg; and the horse, frightened at the shout that was raised, dashed off to a wood, slipped his foot into a hole, and got his leg broken.

"Here was a chain of retribution. I was forcibly struck at seeing how each was paid back for his deed of violence, and it set me to thinking what a load of evil I was heaping up that should fall one day upon my own head. It was this reflection that, by the will of God, worked such a great and instant change in my conduct."

Thus it is in our lives. No one can do a cruel or unjust or even foolish action without suffering, sooner or later, the pains that surely spring from his folly or sin. If you sow the seed of thistles or brambles, do not wonder that, when they are grown, your hands are stung and torn in grasping them.—Selected.

May.

NOW the bright morning star, day's harbinger,
Comes dancing from the East, and leads with her
The flowery May, who from her green lap throws
The yellow cowslip and the pale primrose.
Hail, bounteous May! that doth inspire
Mirth, and youth, and warm desire;
Woods and groves are of thy dressing,
Hill and dale doth boast thy blessing,
Thus we salute thee with our early song,
And welcome thee, and wish thee long. —Milton.

The Intelligence of Wasps.

BUT the greatest display of wasp intelligence I ever saw manifested was by a queen in early spring. A little earthen bird-house was fastened under the eaves in the rear of the house and she selected this snug retreat as a fitting place to rear the future colony.

She had commenced work when a pair of bluebirds disputed her right to the house. The queen is necessarily absent much of the time scraping weather beaten boards or posts to get material to make her paper cells, and during her absences the birds were busily at work carrying in material for their nest. But I soon heard them making a plaintive noise. They stood on the edge of the roof, the female with her mouth full of straws, and whenever she attempted to go to the house the wasp would dart toward her and drive her back. But this state of affairs could not last long. The queen must go on with her work, and no sooner was she gone than the birds recommenced the building, and were fast filling up the house. And now this wise queen went to other queens—who probably had not yet commenced work as it was in April—and made them understand the dilemma she was in, and five sisters came to her aid and remained on the outside of the little house, while she went to and fro on her journeys, and each time the birds came near they would dart at them. This continued until the birds were driven from the field and obliged to take another house. And now the five queens disappeared, leaving their sister in peaceful possession of the property. —Mrs. Mary Treat, in Wide Awake.

Where There's a Will, There's a Way.

THIS is a very old proverb and a very true one. Sometimes we forget it, though, and say "I can't" before we have really tried at all. Some years ago a few kind people made up their minds to try to get hold of all the chimney-sweeps in Dublin and give them an education. One day a little fellow came who was asked if he knew his letters.

"O yes," he answered.

"Can you spell?"

"O yes."

"Can you read?"

"O yes."

"What books did you learn from?"

"Please, sir, I never had a book."

"Then who was your schoolmaster?"

"I never went to school at all."

The gentleman stared, for it seemed very strange that a boy should be able to read and spell and yet never have had a master.

"Then, how ever did you learn?" he asked.

The little boy smiled, and linked his arm in that of a sweep somewhat older than himself.

"Please, sir, Jim taught me the letters over the shop-doors as we went to our work, and now I know all the words by heart; and if you'd kindly let us have some books to read and teach us to do sums and writing, we'd be very thankful."

"Can't you fancy what good pupils those two boys became, and how they delighted in reading books instead of making their necks ache by peering up at the shops?—Selected.

The Weather Prophet.

AN exchange quotes these signs of the weather:

When soot falls down, when spaniels sleep,
And spiders from their cobwebs peep,

Loud quack the ducks, the sea-fowls cry,
The distant hills are looking nigh.

Puss on the hearth, with velvet paws,
Sits wiping o'er her whiskered jaws.

The smoke from chimneys right ascends,
Then spreading, back to earth it bends.

The wind unsteady veers around,
Or settling in the South is found.

The glow-worms, numerous and bright,
Illumed the dewy hill last night.

When through the clear stream fishes rise
And nimbly catch the incautious flies,—

When one or all these things you see,
Foul weather it will surely be.

A Hebrew-Christian Prayer-Meeting.

AT the usual Friday evening prayer-meeting of last week, held at the Hebrew-Christian Church, No. 17 St. Mark's Place, in this city, the pastor, the Rev. Jacob Freshman, made remarks which sounded like a bugle call to all Christians with regard to Jewish missions.

After the opening service of song followed by prayer, Mr. Freshman read the 102d Psalm and made expository comments, dwelling especially upon the thirteenth and fourteenth verses: "Thou shalt arise and have mercy upon Zion: for the time to favor her, yea, the set time is come. For thy servants take pleasure in her stones, and favor the dust thereof." The Lord's faithful children delight in even the humblest service to Zion. They take pleasure in her stones and favor even the very dust, so that they may have part in the upbuilding of the Lord's kingdom. "So the heathen shall fear the name of the Lord, and all the kings of the earth thy glory." Ah, yes, the heathen and unbelievers must see that Christians are different from other men, that they do delight in even the humblest, meanest service in the upbuilding of His kingdom, and then the heathen themselves will fear the name of the Lord. There must be holy zeal and genuine self-sacrifice from affection before unbelievers are impressed by Christians as giving proof of the truth of Christianity.

The exposition reached its most thrilling point of interest, however, at the sixteenth verse: "When the Lord shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory." Prophecy is being fulfilled. The Jews are returning to Palestine. That the Lord is to come in His glory not even the Jews themselves doubt. Two comings of the Messiah, the first in humiliation and the second in great glory, are distinctly foretold in the Old Testament prophecies. "I gave," said Mr. Freshman, "a little book to a young Israelite the other day. It was on the two comings of the Lord and it was nearly all made up of quotations from the Bible. The first coming in humiliation has been literally accomplished. The Lord was born as a little child, lived and suffered as a man among us. He surely will come again in His glory. O, when the Jews gathering in Palestine shall see Him in His unspeakable glory whom they have pierced, will they not cry out in their anguish of soul to Christians, 'You never told us, you never told us what you believed about the Christ!' O, the responsibility, the responsibility of Christians in making known to Jews the first coming in humiliation of the Lord. Will they not exclaim, 'You did not try to make known the Messiah to us.'"

With historical references and tracing of prophecy now being fulfilled, Mr. Freshman enlarged upon the above points, glanced forward to events foretold, the "waxing old" of the heavens, their being "changed as a vesture," and closed with thanksgiving in view of the fact that Jehovah is unchangeable: His promises endure and His "years shall have no end."

A young gentleman, a Hebrew convert, spoke in a very interesting manner of the power of Christianity in changing the heart and life, making a man indeed new in Christ Jesus. Before experiencing the great change wrought by accepting Jesus Christ as the Messiah, his whole eager aim had been that of personal ambition to gain knowledge, power, and above all, wealth and the regard of his fellow men. Now he found joy in self-denial, in the lowest service for Christ, his thirst of heart being to bring others to know Him. He counted nothing loss so that he gained Christ. This young man's manner and speech carried most pathetic and uncompromising conviction that he meant every word that he said and more than he could express.

A Hebrew lady gave most joyous and hearty testimony to the depth of satisfaction experienced in the Christian life since her conversion and to the change in her views of life, having formerly deeply enjoyed wealth and gayety for their own sake.

A recently converted Jewish rabbi who now assists Mr. Freshman gave interesting testimony. So also did a Hebrew lady baptized and admitted to membership in the Hebrew-Christian Church a few weeks ago.

A youthful convert who has just received the rite of baptism desired to speak in German. As the majority of those present understood English he confined himself to brief but earnest expressions of love to the Lord Jesus Christ.

Little as these brief paragraphs can tell, they give perhaps an indication of what constitutes the interest of the Hebrew-Christian meetings. The effect produced upon some minds may be illustrated by the remark of a rather worldly young lady, a church member, who after attending one of these meetings asked an older Christian, "Do you believe as they do there?" and added, "Why, it makes anybody feel as though the Lord Jesus Christ was right there. I never believed so much in any people before."

There is, it seems to the writer, a peculiar thoroughness in which the Jewish mind accepts Christianity when it does accept. There are no reserves. Mr. Freshman's "converts" soon scatter abroad because of home persecution and other reasons, but there has never failed to be a group to give these testimonies, and those who are dispersed keep up communication with the home church, and many of them are bearing the light to others.

AN OCCASIONAL VISITOR.

NEW YORK, May 24th.

The Union of Churches.

A YEAR ago it was proposed to the Mercersburg Classis of the Reformed Church of the United States to overture the General Synod to take steps to bring about an organic union with the Reformed Church in America and the Presbyterian Church. The paper presented was referred to a committee, which reported it with approbation for adoption by the Classis at its recent meeting on May 17th. The report in the Greencastle Press of the 20th does not say whether the paper was adopted or not. It is as follows:

Whereas, The division of the Church of Christ weakens its power and is contrary to the teaching and spirit of the Gospel, and

Whereas, It is the duty of all Christians to labor and pray for the unity and peace of the Church, and

Whereas, The Reformed Church of America and the Presbyterian Church hold the Heidelberg Catechism in common with our own Reformed Church to be a correct exposition of the plan of salvation, and have substantially the same Presbyterial form of church government and mode of worship, therefore

Resolved, That this Classis respectfully overtures the General Synod of the Reformed Church in the United States to adopt measures at its next meeting, to be held in Akron, Ohio, in 1887, to bring about, if possible, a closer union of these important branches in the great Reformed family of churches.

Resolved, That in the judgment of this Classis the Heidelberg Catechism, or what is the heart and core of it, the Apostles' Creed, should form the general basis of such union, together with the Westminster Standards, as they have been defined and interpreted by the terms of the Declaratory Act of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland in 1879, the more important of which are as follows:

1. That in regard to the doctrines of redemption as taught in the Standards and in consistency therewith the love of God to all mankind, His gift of His Son to be the propitiation for the sins of the whole world and the free offer of salvation to men, without distinction, on the ground of Christ's perfect sacrifice, are matters which have been and continue to be regarded by this Synod as vital in the system of Gospel truth, and to which due prominence ought ever to be given.

2. That the doctrine of the Divine decrees, including the doctrine of election to eternal life, is held in connection and harmony with the truth that God is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance, and He has provided a salvation sufficient for all, adapted to all and offered to all in the Gospel, and also the responsibility of every man for his dealing with the free and unrestricted offer of eternal life.

Resolved, That, as the principle of representative self-government underlies the polity and administration of every branch of the Reformed Church, we respectfully advise that steps be taken by the different judicatories of the respective churches to submit the question of organic union to the different consistories, sessions and congregations in the three denominations aforesaid for their approval or disapproval, believing as we do that a great majority of members in each denomination will favor the proposed action.

DECORATION DAY was very generally observed this year, it being the twenty-fifth anniversary of the outbreak of the War. President Cleveland reviewed the processions both in this city and in Brooklyn. The chief interest centered in the ceremonies at the tomb of General Grant. The crowd there was estimated from fifty to seventy-five thousand. Members of the Grant family occupied the platform; Mrs. Grant was too ill to attend. The North Atlantic squadron, at anchor in the Hudson, fired minute guns through the afternoon. At Grant's tomb the Grand Army ritual was read, and "Nearer, My God, to Thee" sung, when the Rev. Dr. Storrs offered prayer, which was followed by the oration by General Logan.

The floral tributes excelled anything ever before seen in this country. They came from nearly all the States and territories; from Mexico, St. Johns, N. B., South and Central American States, and from foreign Ministers. Conspicuous among them was a horse, a cannon with a dove on the mouth, a piece from Michigan, eight feet by six, containing seventy thousand immortelles and ten thousand carnations and roses. Hundreds of legends in evergreens and flowers appeared on the floral front of fifty feet, and the interior of the tomb was a mass of plants and flowers.

THE HON. CALEB S. TITSWORTH, an eminent lawyer of Newark, N. J., and ex Judge of the Law Court of Essex County, died at his residence in that city after a protracted illness, on Friday, May 28th, in the sixtieth year of his age. Judge Titsworth was an exemplary and honored citizen and a man of strong Christian principles, devoted to his profession and heartily respected by the community in which he lived. He leaves a widow and four children, one of whom is the wife of the Rev. Livingston L. Taylor of this city.

The General Outlook.

....The General Assembly at Minneapolis entertained propositions in relation to the celebration of the centennial of Presbyterianism in this country, to be held in 1888 in Philadelphia, where the first Assembly was convened, the churches in 1887–88 to raise five millions of dollars for the causes of the denomination as a thank-offering. The Southern Assembly accepted an invitation to unite in the celebration.

The report of a special committee to examine the accounts of the Board of Publication from the beginning was received. It declared that not a shadow of dishonesty rested on anyone connected with the Board, and made some suggestions in regard to the operations of the Board which the Assembly declined to adopt.

An overture to make elders eligible to the position of Moderator was presented, and referred to a committee.

Ministerial Relief received earnest attention. It provides for an addition to ministers' salaries from the funds of the Assembly's committee. The recommendation to preach a sermon for this object on the first Sabbath of October was adopted.

On the 27th the Board of Education reported 638 men receiving aid, and receipts for the year of $82,217, an increase of over $9,000 on the previous year. Power to license lay preachers was vigorously advocated by several speakers, and the matter was referred to a committee to report next year.

The Church Erection Committee reported $116,578 received during the year. Unusual interest was aroused by the announcement that a former Treasurer had made unauthorized grants, but it was reported that these grants had been returned or secured.

....According to reports from Bohemia it appears that the Old Catholic movement is making rapid progress in the southern part of that country. It is believed that a very large accession is likely soon to be made to its ranks. The church clergy, it is said, have taken alarm, and they have signed an address to the bishop, urging him to approach the government, and, if necessary, the emperor, in order that the movement may be opposed by legal and administrative measures.

....In addition to the usual Easter offerings at Emmanuel Church, Episcopal, Bellows Falls, Vt., there was placed upon the altar the deed of a piece of land adjoining the church property which is valued at $2,000. It is the gift of Madam James H. Williams and her children.

....Sites have now been secured both at Oxford and Cambridge upon which churches will be erected for the use of Presbyterian undergraduates. The English deputies will bring the claims of these two efforts before the Supreme Courts of the Scottish churches.

....Mr. Leicester, M. P., speaking at breakfast held in Glasgow in connection with the Scottish Temperance League, alluded to what he termed the temperance revival in the House of Commons since 1880. In the House to day they had 350 members pledged to temperance legislation, which was the dawn of a better day for England.

Financial.

TUESDAY, June 1st.

THE imports of merchandise at this port last week were valued at $8,724,-785, and the exports at $6,032,652. The export of specie amounted to $2,992,-779, of which about $400,000 was silver. Sterling exchange closed on Saturday at $4 88 for 60 day bills and $4 90 for demand. The export of wheat is more free than it has been.

The bank report shows loans reduced $588,700, specie $302,400, deposits $444,-100, and an increase in legal tenders of $220,600. The surplus of reserve was increased $29,425, and became $13,830,-600, but a part of Saturday's export of specie does not appear in the report. The rate on money on Saturday was 1 1-2 to 2 per cent on call. The Bank of England rate remains at 3 per cent.

The Stock Market shows a small gain in values for the week.

European grain markets reported as dull on Saturday. Prices tend to decline. Quotations for June delivery were on Saturday: Wheat here 83 7-8; corn 44 3-4; oats 34 1-2. The growing crops in a promising condition generally. Cotton closed at: June 9.19-20; July 9.29-30; August 9.39-40; Sept. 9 23-24. The demand for hay and straw is light. Choice timothy 80 to 85 cents, No. 1 long rye straw 90 cents.

Market Report.

Review of the New York Market for Butter, Cheese, etc. Reported by DAVID W. LEWIS & Co., Produce Commission Merchants, 49 Pearl St., New York.
Commission on Butter, Eggs, Poultry, etc., is five per cent; Flour, Grain, etc., 2½ per cent.
Marking-plates furnished when desired.

NEW YORK, May 29, 1886.

BUTTER.—Receipts for the week, 48,469 pks.; exports 4,198 pks.

Receipts were the largest ever known for one week in the month of May, and the general tone of the market was weaker, and prices on everything except "extras" were lower. There were sales of some special creameries in pails to retail grocery trade at 18c., but 16a17c. was best could be made to jobbers, and good many pails are going over unsold. We note sales of State creamery in half-firkin tubs at 16a 17c., and Northern make in Welsh tubs at 15½a 16½c. Exporters took few sample lots of Western creamery at 14a15a16c., the latter price for finest makes, and about 2,000 pks. fair to good Western were taken for German account at 8a12c. Market closes with good stocks and prices in buyers' favor. We quote:

Fancy creamery	17 @18
do dairy (selections)	15 @16
Good to fine	13 @14
Poor to common	7 @12

CHEESE.—Receipts for the week, 38,715 boxes; exports 28,157 boxes.

Trade has been sluggish all week at a decline of ½a¾c. Shippers have taken fine stock at 7½a7¾c., and good sound useful cheese at 6a7. Night skims sold at 4½a5½c., and closely skimmed cheese are hardly saleable at any price. We quote:

Factory, full cream, fine	7½@ 7¾
" fair to good	6 @ 7¼
" skims	1½@ 2

EGGS.—Receipts for the week were 18,817 bbls. and 15,635 cases.

The advance noted in our last has been followed by large receipts, dull market and a decline of fully 1c. per doz. Sales on 'Change to-day were 50 bbls. Iowas at 11¾c., and 20 bbls. Illinois at 11½c. We quote:

Near-by marks, fresh eggs	12½@13
Southern and Western eggs	11½@12

Puppies in Soap.

I was in New York last week Tuesday. And as I was on my way up —— street at six o'clock, I saw a little colored boy ahead of me carrying a black dog, which I noticed was dead. Thinking the little fellow had lost a playmate, I said to him, "Did your dog die, my boy?" "Lor, no," answered the ragamuffin, "'taint mine! Tom Fletcher's dog it is. Got shot. I am takin' it to the soap works. Git a quarter for it, for soap grease!" He turned down an alley, and just ahead I saw the soap works where my favorite soap is manufactured! Oh, how disgusted I was! I went home at night, still full of indignation, for—what do you think?—I had for months washed my dishes with that very soap! Oh, paugh! No more soap in my dish-pan. I began that same evening to wash in clear water, but, to my mortification, my dishes, that I had always been so proud of because they were nice and bright after washing, looked dull and dingy. By next-day noon I was discouraged, and forthwith I sought our Mrs. Clary, my neighbor, who is the pink of propriety among housekeepers. I was determined that my misery should have company, and therefore I told Mrs. Clary all about that canine soap. And she only smiled! "Why," she said, "I never use soap; but in my dish-water I put Pearline, the same as we do in our wash-tubs; it takes off all grease and stains, and—there are no puppies in it!" I said no more, but adopted her plan, and am satisfied. But others may be as careless as I was, so in all humility I write unto you. Never put soap on a dish you eat out of or from when you can get Pearline.—L. C. M., in Mirror and Farmer, Manchester, N. H.

Boils, abscesses, tumors, and even cancers, are the result of a natural effort of the system to expel the poisons which the liver and kidneys have failed to remove. Ayer's Sarsaparilla stimulates all the organs to a proper performance of their functions.

To thoroughly cure scrofula, it is necessary to strike directly at the root of the evil. This is exactly what Hood's Sarsaparilla does, by acting upon the blood, thoroughly cleansing it of all impurities, and leaving not even a taint of scrofula in the vital fluid.

KING.—On Sunday, May 30th, at the residence of his father, Dr. N. S. King, 305 Alexander avenue, N. Y. city, Rev. James F. King, pastor of the Reformed Church of Roxbury, N. Y., in the 29th year of his age.

LEO.—In New York, suddenly, May 21st, Mrs. John P. Leo, in the 25th year of her age.

Mrs. Leo was the youngest daughter of the late Mr. James Doig, of Brooklyn, E. D., and the sister of the Rev. Robert Doig. Her early home life was exceptionally happy. She was the youngest of five sisters, and was the joy and pet of the household. Three years ago last March she made confession of her faith in Christ and was baptized and received into the membership of the Greenpoint Reformed Church. In the following December she married Mr. John P. Leo, a young and successful architect in New York. Her married life was full of happiness, and when a little one was born to them and a mother's love awakened, her cup of blessing seemed full. No sorrow had ever come to her; the large family circle had been unbroken, and her life, blessed with many friends and many joys, had been bright and beautiful and happy. Suddenly sorrow came. The father, after very brief illness, was taken away before she could reach his bedside. The blow was a very severe one to her, as to all the family; for the first time death came to them, and she grieved very much over her loss. The week following her father's death she took a slight cold but otherwise was in usual health, when on the evening of May 20th a severe attack of coughing was induced by the fumes of a sulphur match and a blood vessel in the brain was ruptured, and in a few hours, before any one imagined she was seriously ill, she was dead.

The shock to husband and family was very great and the sorrow most intense, and widespread and sincere was the mourning, for she had a very large circle of friends and was loved by all who knew her. Her funeral was attended at her mother's home less than two weeks after her father had been carried from the same house to his burial.

Thus a beautiful, happy Christian life has ended here only to begin, we believe, with purer joys and richer blessings in the heavenly land; but the Church, the Sunday-school Bible class of which she was for many years an enthusiastic member, and all who knew her sincerely mourn their loss, while they recognize the fact that death to her was gain.
COM.

SOUTHARD.—At Cornwall, N. Y., on May 4th, 1886, of pneumonia, Samuel R. Southard, in the 77th year of his age.

Deceased was born near Baskingridge, N. J., December 12th, 1809. In addition to positive and intelligent religious instruction in the home his early years were spent under the ministry of those marked men, Drs. Finley and Brownlee, so that he left the paternal roof to seek his fortunes in the world with decided convictions, which he carried with him through life. He was engaged in business pursuits in Newark, N. J., for about forty years, during which time he took an active part in the affairs of the Reformed Church, being identified with the First Reformed in its earliest history, and going forth from that communion as an elder to organize, with a few others, the Second Reformed Church of that city, in connection with which he labored till his removal to another part of the State. Diligent in business he was equally energetic and faithful in the Church of Christ. For one of so deep convictions he was remarkably conciliatory. A steadfast piety was joined with soundness of judgment to an unusual degree, so that more than one pastor appreciated his value in council. He was an instance of quiet zeal and persevering faith. His faith remained strong to the last. His end was peace. During life he had been sustained through manifold trial by the Christian hope, and in his case the righteous had hope in his death. F.

Give Ye Them to Eat.

LUKE 9:13.

OUR Saviour in His lowly, human guise,
With untired hands and overflowing heart,
Fed all within His reach who would receive
The heavenly bread and His eternal life.
The hunger of the world did pierce Him sore;
He had compassion on the multitude,
For some were famishing and felt it not,
And none could understand how poor they were,
As He who knew the boundless wealth of heaven.

Unspairing as the true physician's steel
When nothing but the knife can heal the hurt,
As sweet and tender as an angel's kiss
In all His ministries to loving ones,
A little while He blessed the sorrowing world
And set the truth a-shining in its dark,
And then so quickly went; but not until
His own were charged to carry on His work.
And still all solemnly the word comes down
To us: "If thou dost love Me, feed My lambs,
And feed My sheep."
There's no evading this
Most sacred trust; the feast is free and full—
As freely ye receive, so freely give.

Lord Jesus, from Thy bounty infinite
We take the living loaf and pass it on!
And praise Thee as we find our nourishment
While serving as Thou didst in humbleness;
And bless Thee that the cheer runs never low,
For ever as of old it multiplies
Till more is left than all is given away,
And we are full and strong and glad in Thee,
The never-failing fountain of our joy,
Whose richest gift is power to feed Thy flock.

The Conversion of Children.

THE Central Presbyterian Church of this city rejoiced in an addition of sixty-five members on Sabbath, Feb. 7th. A praise meeting was held in the evening. Mr. Ralph Wells was one of the speakers. A correspondent of the Evangelist gives this sketch of what he said:

When the speaker was beginning his Sunday-school work, Dr. Alexander said to him: "Young man, make much of the blood!" He had never forgotten these words, and in the thirty years which had followed he believed he had never omitted to make much of the blood, in his private teaching and in public addresses. Dr. Alexander also said to him once, "If I were to live my ministerial life over again, I should preach more to the children than to the grown people." He seemed to think that much of his preaching was a failure; the Gospel pellets fell off from his hearers like shot from an iron-clad. Mr. Wells read the testimony of many well-known preachers and teachers as to the stability of child converts, and then added, that for seventeen years he was superintendent of Dr. Hutton's school on Washington Square. Dr. Hutton was an eminently safe and conservative man. So were his elders. Yet during these years about 1,400 young people were added to the church from the Sunday-school. He once asked Dr. Hutton how these converts had stood the test of time. The doctor did not answer at once, but said he would look carefully over the books. In a few days he returned answer, that so far as he knew, not one had given them trouble, or brought discredit upon their profession.

Mr. Wells said that there was no limit to the age at which a child might become a Christian. The moment that the child could understand that it was a sinner, and that Jesus died to save even children, was the moment when conversion was possible. He told the story of a friend who distinctly remembered his mother praying over him, when she thought he was asleep, and a hot tear falling upon his face. He was only three years old then, but he dated his conversion back to that time. Also of a little girl who was converted by the words in a public address, "you, the sinner." Parents and teachers are not direct enough, and they do not expect enough. This accounts for the fact that children, long taught by one teacher, on being transferred to another teacher in a very short time become Christians. The new teaching was intensely personal, and the children were made to feel that they were expected to become Christians.

A Town Changed.

A CORRESPONDENT sends the following interesting account of a revival in a Western town, which has been thoroughly changed thereby, saloon-keepers being converted as well as merchants and whole families.

This town, in common with all others, was under the domination of the devil, who, through the lurements of the "no harm" worldly amusements, such as progressive euchre, dancing and roller skating, had drawn many of the socially influential church members into their bewildering power. The young people followed, of course, and every grade of society was completely carried away to the abandonment of church socials, lectures and music of a high order, and consequent disrelish and neglect of the means of grace followed. The Bible gave way to the pack of cards, and the songs of Zion to the mirth of the rink.

Of course spiritual life decayed, and the prodigals fed on husks and rather liked them. Church members complained of long prayers and tedious meetings, but spent from four to twenty-four hours at the card-table with great ease and deepening interest. To check this and revive spiritual life that remained in some hearts, I commenced early in the fall of '85 to agitate a union revival meeting that should continue all winter and commence before clubs were formed. The sister churches save one opposed union, some on one ground and some on another, and commenced at once denominational revival meetings, which they continued from four to six weeks, employing neighboring pastors to preach. No results of mention followed. I held meetings a week before the Week of Prayer, during it and after it, with increasing interest. I engaged State Evangelist Norris and the Baptist Church joined. About 175 were converted. Young people from every society came and were converted, and every church was strengthened. Dancing and card-playing ceased, the rink played out, and the leading, substantial young business men were converted and the morals of that town changed. Church members gave up the dance and saw in progressive euchre nothing but gambling, and confessed before God and the church their sins and backslidings and returned to their "first works," and their families were converted in every instance.

The sermons were plain, simple, faithful efforts to unfold God's Word, exalting Christ above the speaker. A longing for the fulness of the Spirit was the first indication of a revival. Church members prayed and believed, and God came and filled them. Every convert was a special subject of prayer. Individual work for souls was emphasized, example, exhortation, faith—in a word, consecration. "Separate yourselves," was the watchword. "I will" answer thee, thus saith the Lord.

We are now redeemed—a young people's society of Christian Endeavor organized, a prayer-meeting overflowing and motions to extend the hour. Cards have been voluntarily burned and fiddlers dismissed. God is honored, Christ exalted. The Holy Spirit is present. Christians are happy, families are serving the Lord. Bless His name.—The Congregationalist.

INTRODUCTION.

ABOUT six months after the feeding of the multitudes on the shore of Galilee the Feast of Tabernacles was celebrated. Jesus had not visited Jerusalem at the preceding Passover because it was not safe for Him to so. After the discourse on the Bread of Life He had kept Himself somewhat apart from the multitudes, and sought to prepare the minds of His disciples for His approaching death. It was during this interval that He visited Tyre and Sidon, and Cesarea Phillipi, and also was transfigured in the presence of the three favored disciples. When the time came for the pilgrims to leave Galilee in order to attend this feast, the brethren of Jesus, who as yet did not understand Him, urged Him to go to Jerusalem and there make known His claims in a public manner. Jesus put them off by saying that He was not ready to go up to the feast, so that they started without Him. About the middle of the feast, which lasted for a week, Jesus appeared suddenly in the temple while the people were wondering about Him. He immediately began to teach the multitudes who assembled every day in the courts of the temple. His first address was really a continuation of that which He had made at His former visit, when the Jews had determined to put Him to death for Sabbath breaking and blasphemy. The result of the words of Jesus was to intensify the differences of opinion concerning Him which were already dividing the people into hostile factions. The events recorded in our lesson occurred at the close of the feast, and were evidently intended to apply the symbols of the occasion to Jesus as the Christ.

THE LESSON.

I. JESUS AND THE MULTITUDE.—VS. 37-44.

V. 37.—"Now on the last day." There is some diversity of opinion as to whether this was the seventh or eighth day, as both were kept with peculiar solemnities. On the seventh day the pitcher of water from Siloam was poured upon the altar amid the shouts of the people and the sound of the trumpets. It was probably in reference to this ceremony and to the water that followed the Jews through the wilderness that Jesus, "Cried, saying, If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink." The word "cried" means to proclaim as a herald.

V. 38.—"He that believeth on me." This is equivalent to the "Come unto me" of the preceding verse. To come to Jesus is to believe Him and to believe in Him. "As the Scripture hath said." We cannot find any one passage corresponding to these words, but they give the substance of many passages. "Out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water." This implies, not only an abundant supply for the believer himself, but an overflow whereby he may become a source of blessing unto others. The Christian is not to be a passive recipient all his life. "Freely ye have received, freely give."

V. 39.—"This spake he of the Spirit." The Spirit is the executive of the Godhead. It is he who takes the things of Jesus and shows them unto us. "The Holy Ghost was not yet given." The word "given" is explanatory. Literally, "was not." The Holy Ghost had wrought before this, and His work is recognized in the Old Testament Scriptures, but the Dispensation of the Spirit was not yet. "Jesus was not yet glorified." Only after His return to the Father could Jesus send His ascension gift of the Comforter.

V. 40.—"Many of the people therefore....said, Of a truth this is the prophet" The effect of these discourses of Jesus, of which we probably have only outlines, was to make a favorable impression on the multitude, the most of whom were ready to acknowledge Him as either the Messenger to announce the Messiah, or the Prophet spoken of by Moses.

V. 41.—"Others said, This is the Christ." Probably a smaller number of the more thoughtful and believing. "Some said, Shall Christ come out of Galilee?" Here we see the prejudice of ignorance blocking the way of the truth. This specious objection no doubt had the effect of deciding some of the wavering ones against Christ. These objectors were well acquainted with the declaration of prophecy concerning the birth of Christ, but they had not taken the trouble to satisfy themselves as to the facts in the case. Their ignorance was entirely without excuse.

V. 43.—"So there was a division among the people because of him." The great mass of the people did not take an active interest either for or against Jesus until the last moment. They hovered about Him, and inclined now to accept and then to reject Him as their Master, but were as unstable as water.

V. 44.—"Some of them would have taken him." The officers sent to arrest Him were probably among His auditors at this time, and some, sympathizing with the rulers, were ready to assist in taking Him prisoner, "But no man laid hands on him." He was protected by the sacred awe which His simple presence so often produced upon the people.

II. THE PHARISEES AND NICODEMUS.—VS. 45-52.

V. 45.—"Then came the officers to the chief priests and Pharisees." The Sanhedrin seems to have been in session during this time, expecting every moment to have this disturber of their peace brought before them. Their officers returned without having carried out their instructions. "Why have ye not brought him?" To these men it seemed like a very simple matter to arrest a single malefactor in the very act of teaching sedition and heresy. They were surprised and offended at the failure of their officers.

V. 46.—"Never man spake like this man." This was their only excuse. They had been overawed by the power of Christ's words and were powerless to obey the commands of their superiors.

Vs. 47-49.—The answer of the rulers to the officers contained in these verses, shows the spirit of those who were seeking to destroy Jesus. They assumed the correctness of their own position, and therefore that all who thought otherwise must be deceived. They appealed to the authority of their class. "Have any of the rulers or of the Pharisees believed on him?" They would not acknowledge the right of the people to think for themselves. "This people who knoweth not the law are cursed." The rabbis looked down upon the masses with perfect contempt, and did not regard them as capable of receiving instruction, or of being saved.

V. 50.—"Nicodemus saith unto them." This question of Nicodemus was an immediate answer to their sneer, "Have any of the Pharisees believed?" Here was one of the chiefs of this assembly ready to put in a protest against their unfair course. Under ordinary circumstance Nicodemus might have uttered this protest for fair play without committing himself, but in the condition of opinion at that time his question was a confession of some degree of faith in Jesus.

V. 51.—"Doth our law judge any man before it hear him." Jesus had never been arrested, tried, or formally condemned, yet these men had already determined upon His death.

V. 52.—The only answer they would give to this just question, which should have stirred their consciences and brought a blush of shame to their cheeks, was another sneer. "Art thou also of Galilee?" Nathaniel had a similar prejudice against a man of Nazareth, but he did not allow that prejudice to stand in the way of seeking the truth. This prejudice cherished, became a judicial blindness, so that these rulers, having eyes, saw not.

LESSONS FOR TO-DAY.

1. Every religious service is an invitation to Christ.

2. If we know that we are needy, we know that Jesus is ready to supply our need.

3. The Holy Ghost was Christ's first gift to His Church.

4. God restrains the opposition of wicked men.

5. When others dishonor Christ we should be the more earnest in confessing Him.

6. Only blind prejudice can reject Christ.

7. The world will hate Christ's friends.

8. We can afford to bear the enmity of the world when we have the love of Christ.

The Morning Call.

BY PHŒBUS.

Special to my big boy Sammy,
But general to all sleepers;
Befitting also our good Fannie,
Who found it hard to ope her peepers.

GET UP, get up, at once; come, SAMMY,
The morning air is fresh and balmy;
The warm south wind is gently blowing,
The cock in th' barn is gayly crowing.

The sun on wheels comes quickly rushing,
The Eastern sky lights up with blushing;
In town, on hill, the bells are ringing,
The lark and robin sweetly singing.

Our PET for oats is waiting, neighing,
Our hens are up and at their laying;
Down from the scaffolds come they cackling,
But not a duck around is quacking.

The lawn's young grass is brightly greening,
With nightspun webs and dewdrops gleaming;
The trees are fairly out a-shooting,
The owl demure has stopped his hooting.

Awake! awake! stop useless dreaming!
Just hear the peacock shrilly screaming;
All Nature wears a face so smiling,
She calls, she calls, from sleep to toiling.

O SAM YOU WELL, let nothing hinder,
While light streams in your chamber window;
Be up, be up, begin well-doing,
Go forth your daily task pursuing.

Ope both your eyes, begin your winking,
Then set your thoughts to sober thinking;
Give to yourself a tidy dressing,
Then look, look up, and ask God's blessing—

Upon yourself and all your working,
That you may be no duty shirking;
That you may quite fulfill your mission,
And meet the claims of your condition;

That you in all your daily living,
May look to God, due glory giving;
Then shall the Sun of righteousness
Shine in your soul, enlight and bless.

A Boy's Decision.

MANY years ago, Mr. Hall, an English gentleman, visited Ireland for the purpose of taking sketches of its most beautiful scenery, to be used in an illustrated work on Ireland, which has since been published.

On one occasion, when about to spend a day in the neighborhood of Lake Killarney, he met a bright young Irish lad, who offered his services as guide through the district.

A bargain was made with him, and the party went off. The lad proved himself well acquainted with all the places of interest in that neighborhood, and had plenty of stories to tell about them. He did his work well, and to the entire satisfaction of the visitors. On their return to the starting point, Mr. Hall took a flask of whiskey from his pocket, and drank some. Then he handed it to the boy, and asked him to help himself. To his great surprise the offer was firmly, but politely declined.

Mr. Hall thought this was very strange. To find an Irish boy who would not touch or taste whiskey was stranger to him than anything he had seen that day. He could not understand it; and he resolved to try the strength of the boy's temperance principles. He offered first a shilling, then half a crown, and then five shillings, if he would taste that whiskey. But the boy was firm. A real manly heart was beating under his ragged jacket. Mr. Hall determined to try him further, so he offered the boy a golden half-sovereign if he would take a drink of whiskey. That was a coin seldom seen by lads of this class in these parts. Straightening himself up, with a look of indignation in his face, the boy pulled out a temperance medal from the inner pocket of his jacket, and holding it bravely up, he said: "This was my father's medal. For years he was intemperate. All his wages were spent in drink. It almost broke my mother's heart; and what a hard time she had to keep the poor children from starving! At last my father took a stand. He signed the pledge, and wore this medal as long as he lived. On his death-bed he gave it to me. I promised him that I would never drink intoxicating liquor; and now, sir, for all the money your honor may be worth, a hundred times over, I would not break that promise." That boy's decision about drink was noble Yes; and it did do good, too. As Mr. Hall stood there astonished, he screwed the top on to his flask, and flung it into the water of the lake near which they stood.

Then he turned to the lad and shook him warmly by the hand, saying as he did so:

"My boy, that's the best temperance lecture I ever heard. I thank you for it. And now, by the help of God, I will never drink another drink of intoxicating liquor while I live."—Rev. Dr. R. Newton.

A GOOD OPINION of one's self is not usually numbered among the Christian virtues. And yet what the world and the Church greatly need to-day is more men who have a good opinion of themselves—so good an opinion of themselves that they would scorn to cherish low aims, or to do a dishonorable action, or to consent to anything on which falls the shadow of a falsehood, or to do wrong to another in word or deed.—S. S. Times.

....Pleasant weather there may be in the voyage of life, but never weather so pleasant that the hand may leave the helm, or the eye the compass.—S. S. Times.

...Those who are firm in their purpose to obey God will not lack for divine aid.—Henderson.

....Slippery places may fling up the heels of great giants, and little temptations may overthrow well-grown Christians —Lee.

Horsford's Acid Phosphate.
Well Pleased.

Dr. C. ROBERTS, Winchester, Ill., says: "I have used it with entire satisfaction in cases of debility from age or overwork, and in inebriates and dyspeptics, and am well pleased with its effects."

That Tired Feeling

The warm weather has a debilitating effect, especially upon those who are within doors most of the time. The peculiar, yet common, complaint known as "that tired feeling," is the result. This feeling can be entirely overcome by taking Hood's Sarsaparilla, which gives new life and strength to all the functions of the body.

"I could not sleep; had no appetite. I took Hood's Sarsaparilla and soon began to sleep soundly; could get up without that tired and languid feeling; and my appetite improved." R. A. SANFORD, Kent, Ohio.

Strengthen the System.

Hood's Sarsaparilla is characterized by three peculiarities: 1st, the combination of remedial agents; 2d, the proportion; 3d, the process of securing the active medicinal qualities. The result is a medicine of unusual strength, effecting cures hitherto unknown. Send for book containing additional evidence.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla tones up my system, purifies my blood, sharpens my appetite, and seems to make me over." J. P. THOMPSON, Register of Deeds, Lowell, Mass.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla beats all others, and is worth its weight in gold." I. BARRINGTON, 130 Bank Street, New York City.

NATURE'S CURE FOR CONSTIPATION,
Sick-Headache,
AND DYSPEPSIA.

Health and Strength can only be maintained by a strict attention to Sanitary Laws, and these demand the prompt removal of all waste material from the body. The slightest irregularity in the action of the Bowels should be instantly corrected by the use of Tarrant's Effervescent Seltzer Aperient,
Which will, in a short time, re-establish that regular habit which is essential to the enjoyment of life and health, and thus cure Constipation. It cures Dyspepsia by enabling the stomach to assimulate proper food, and cures Sick-Headache by removing indigestible accumulations and neutralizing excess of acid. Manufactured only by TARRANT & CO., New York.
Sold by druggists everywhere.

A REVISION of the Declaration of Faith, reported by the Congregational Committee, will be found on the twelfth page. We desire more time to consider it before giving an opinion. To us it is an improvement on the creed of the Committee.

A MORE UNREASONABLE movement on the part of workingmen than that which tied up the horse cars of this city and Brooklyn on last Saturday, it is hard to conceive. It fell with the greatest severity on the working classes. Such occurences if repeated will chill the sympathy of the best friends of laboring men and array the overwhelming majority of citizens against the Unions.

COLUMBIA COLLEGE at the Commencement this week confers the degree of Doctor of Philosophy on a lady—the first time such a thing has occurred in its long history. The lady, Miss Edgerton, is, we understand, a person of unusual gifts and attainments, every way worthy of the distinction. May she have many successors.

THE Y. M. C. A.'s were charged by the Rev. Dr. D. C. Potter, of New York, at a Baptist ministers' meeting in Philadelphia, with taking "the best of the young men out of the churches." We have heard the same complaint from other pastors, especially that the Association draws young men from the Church prayer-meeting to its own.

THE CONGREGATIONALISTS, through their American Home Missionary Society, have entered earnestly upon an endeavor to win to Christ the Bohemian and Polish immigrants of the West and to fit them for American citizenship. If there is a government on the earth or has been in human history which needs genuine Christianity in its citizens more than any other form of government, it is that of these United States. In the first place the Congregational Church has selected first-rate men as its missionaries. The Rev. E. A. Adams who ministers to the Bohemians in Chicago, is a vigorous and graceful writer, an acceptable preacher and a gentleman of superior executive talent. Many congregations of educated Americans would be glad to secure such a man as their pastor. Superintendent Schauffler, the Rev. F. M. Price and Miss Clara Hobart, who are engaged in Christianizing and Americanizing the Bohemians of Cleveland, are no less qualified for the work to which they have been called. And these workmen are supported with generosity. Mr. Adams has two Bohemian helpers and to his work the Society appropriates $3,000 annually, and the associations of Chicago and of Illinois add their gifts. If we reckon that $5,000 a year are expended on this mission, we probably shall not exceed the truth. Two of the conditions of success—well-qualified workmen and a liberal support—are recognized and provided. Besides the preaching services and prayer-meetings and Sabbath-schools, and Bible Readings and conversations in a house-to-house visitation, there are English day schools and industrial schools. In Cleveland the force reaches about one thousand Bohemians and Poles every week. In Chicago Mr. Adams began with a Sabbath attendance of sixteen, and now has an average Sunday audience of seventy adults. In his schools he has over three hundred children. In Detroit a Polish Sunday-school of two hundred members has been gathered, and a very hopeful Bohemian mission has been established at Omaha. Just now the urgent necessity to educate Bohemian and Polish young men for the work of evangelists and pastors is occupying the attention of the Society, and will surely be provided for. A more important and necessary work is conducted nowhere in our country, is evidently in good hands, and we hope, by this brief recital, will be in the minds of members of our branch of the Reformed Church when they pray, as many of them do every day, for the blessing of God upon all attempts to win souls to Christ.

Besides, our Congregational brethren, through the same Society, are conducting a well-appointed effort among Danes, Norwegians and Swedes. They are establishing churches, of course, but have also a Scandinavian department in Carleton College, Minn., and have added also to the Chicago Theological Seminary a Scandinavian department, which has already twenty-one students, mostly Swedes, but including Norwegians and Danes, under the charge of Professor Riseberg, brought from Sweden for the purpose, and Professor Tranberg, who is especially in charge of the Danes and Norwegians. Twenty Scandinavian missionaries are employed by the Society.

These endeavors will be watched with special interest and will be attended with the hearty sympathy of Christian citizens.

Evolution.

NO doubt many are weary of the discussion of the hypothesis of evolution; but it is still a living issue, is the foundation on which agnosticism rests, threatens to destroy the sanctions of morality and the sense of moral responsibility, and books and pamphlets, magazine and newspaper articles are still printed to support it. A valuable book has recently appeared and has led to what we now proceed to say.

The book * is, as it claims in its title, "a summary of the theory of evolution as held by scientists at the present time, and an account of the progress made by the discussions and investigations of a quarter of a century." The editor and author is H. W. Conn, Ph.D., Instructor of Biology at Wesleyan University. It in the first place defines the hypothesis of evolution, arrays in order the facts or what are claimed to be the facts on which the theory rests. When the facts are in controversy, that is stated and the reasons on which the contention is conducted. The survey of the evidence brought forward in support of the theory during twenty-five years conducts the reader over the whole field. Arguments are educed from classification, from Homology or similar and analogous organs, from Rudimentary, Aborted and Nascent organs, from Fossils, from Embryology or the development of the individual from an egg, from the Distribution of Animals and Plants, etc. All this is stated with eminent fairness by Professor Conn. We do not know of another single volume in which the argument and the classes of phenomena on which it rests, is so thoroughly presented. We know of no other one volume in which the objections to the alleged facts and the inferences from them are so impartially, fairly and completely recorded. If we should be asked to name one book in which all the classes of facts and all the essential arguments by which evolution is supported, can be found in a compact and thorough statement, and all the counter arguments, we would recommend this work of Professor Conn. It is an admirable and campact history of the hypothesis. It is very agreeably written and will be read with pleasure. For those who have not the time or the qualifications for continued scientific study, who wish to know just what evolution is, and what it is educed from, and what are the difficulties it encounters, and who wish a statement of the whole matter in plain English, readily understood, we know of no book equal to this. Upon some minor points a somewhat different statement would perhaps be preferred by some advocates or opponents of evolution, but those points are very few in number.

We desire to-day to say a few words on two fundamental propositions or facts. First, Prof. Conn says, (page 23,) "It will be admitted at the outset, on all sides, that no unquestionable instance has been observed of one species being derived from another." That admission, it seems to us, is fatal to the theory. There was evolution in the past, there has been none observed in the present—such is the claim and the counter-acknowledgment. There was then something at work in the past, at work in a peculiar way, which is not at work in that way now. What was that something? If it was inherent in the organism, when did it die, how did it die? If it was not inherent, but a power exerted from without, then the process was not evolution in the strict sense of the term, in the sense in which it is used by Darwin, Haeckel, Huxley, Tyndall, Romaine and the scientific men who have been the chief advocates of the theory. It was a production, in a degree a creation. Mr. Spencer says, and the great body of evolutionists who enter upon the philosophy of the process agree with him, that the evolution is a result of an Infinite and Eternal Energy.

Very well. Now the very first step in the process, which when completed is evidently a new species, is essentially, positively a new species, however slight the deviation may be. That first step is a new species; what follows is only the growth of that new species. And, so far as man knows, that first deviation was not due to an attribute or power inherent in the organization. That cannot be denied. We can suppose, conjecture, imagine, all sorts of inherent powers, but observation does not furnish the first item of unquestionable evidence of the actual existence of such inherent ability. When the Infinite and Eternal Energy is brought in or when the Divine Creator is brought in, as necessary to and bringing about the evolution, that moment the process ceases to be an evolution, becomes a production, a creation of a new thing. The plant or animal has not evolved it, if left to itself never would have evolved it, so far as we know, does not now evolve it, as we positively and assuredly know. The production of a new species from an existing one by a power from without is essentially a creation, or if not so much as that, a making. It is not an evolution in the sense in which Darwin, Huxley and Tyndall use the term.

But organisms do produce variations. Yes, but these variations are never new species. They are confined within not only certain limits, but very narrow limits. They are still and always within the species, show its characteristics and live and die as it does. Not one "unquestionable instance has been observed," as Prof. Conn admits, in which this variation has run into a new species.

Again, and this is our second point, Prof. Conn admits that hybridization results ordinarily in organisms that are not fertile, that do not reproduce themselves. Also that hybridization of animals in a wild state cannot be observed, and therefore nothing can be known about it. But he declares, as many do, that the crossing of species of plants has resulted in organisms which have proved fertile and have reproduced themselves in a permanent succession.

In opposition to this we have to say, that in a clear case of crossing of actually distinct species, where there has been no error in classification—and such errors have been numerous—the hybrid plant has been propagated only at the cost of constant, superintending care under domestication. But put that hybrid out where nature only can care for it, and always,—and we have tried it again and again,—always a few seeds of the first generation will produce plants similar to the hybrid, a still smaller number of the next generation will do so, and in a few years the whole process will have reverted to the original types—the new thing, the hybrid, will have entirely disappeared. Of the first generation the large majority of seeds will revert to the original types, of the second a still larger majority, until in a few years all the seeds produced in a given season will come up, when the time for germination comes, in plants of the original species which were crossed. That is what nature does, when a hybrid produced by man is given over to the care of nature alone. And that is the history of the vast majority of hybrids produced by cross fertilization by bees or other insects or any other natural agency. The universal tendency is to revert to the original types, and not to produce and perpetuate new types.

Evolution is not proved, is very far from being proved. There are likenesses which suggest some such process, appearances sometimes seem to favor it; but the scientific man who has not learned that "appearances are deceitful," is the unfortunate possessor of a very treacherous memory.

God made animals, birds, trees, and herbs producing seed each "after its kind." Evolution has not disproved or weakened that inspired statement.

YET ANOTHER of the stories published in these columns appears as a book. The Presbyterian Board has printed, under the name "Walter Harmsen," the tale of the Reformation times in the Netherlands which was known to our readers by the title, "Among the Sandhills." The story was abridged by the translator for our use; in the book it appears in full. The illustrations are taken from the original work and faithfully represent the costumes and to some degree the habits of the time. The Methodist Book Concern is soon to publish in one volume "The Heretic Priest" and the other stories translated for these columns since 1883. The translations have also attracted considerable attention in the Netherlands. The Rev. Daniel Van Pelt, who has made the renderings, is to be congratulated on the success of his work, and has performed a valuable service for the Church by making known to English readers the life and sufferings, the faith and patience of the Protestants of the Netherlands, as described by popular and trustworthy Dutch authors.

The American, of Philadelphia, one of the best critical journals in the country, records these kind words in regard to Mr. Van Pelt's book:

An excellent book for boys, called "Walter Harmsen," by E. Gerdes, has been issued by the Presbyterian Board of Publication. It is an historical tale dealing with the troubled Reformation times in Holland, in 1580 and the following years, and in the shape of well designed and interesting fiction the vital lessons of the period are strongly enforced. Gerdes is a writer of authority on topics of this nature, and Rev. Daniel Van Pelt, who translated the work from the Dutch, has given it an added value by injecting some special historic matter which makes the scheme more coherent for foreign readers. The Presbyterian Board does admirable work in giving the public books worth reading, and "Walter Harmsen" is one of its best ventures. It is the sad fact that the current of taste is away from this better reading, yet there are some who are thankful for it—perhaps more than, in our discouragement, we are disposed to admit.

OUR JURY SYSTEM. . . . JAEHNE'S RELIGION. . . . BROOKLYN SUNDAY-SCHOOLS. . . . THEATRES AND GOOD FRIDAY. . . . BIBLE "SCIENCE."

WE all understand that the real trial of Jaehne,—as in all similar cases, where money or influence or intimidation or past affiliations are involved in the possible relations of the accused with his triers,—took place before the case was opened. The practical question with people is not whether the accused is guilty, or whether the State has sufficient evidence to convict him, but whether the jury has been "fixed" by a securing beforehand of a number of the persons from whom the twelve are to be selected, or at least by a knowledge of the corruptible or sympathizing elements of the panel, as a guide to the challenges and acceptances of the men. A conviction for bribery had never been obtained from a New York jury on the plainest evidence, and it was felt to be too much of a miracle to expect that at least one man could not be found to stand out for acquittal in this case.

In order to guard against these perils an almost unexampled secrecy was observed as to the persons summoned, and four days of hard work were required in the testing on both sides of the four hundred drawn; and even the twelve were a survival weeded out of twenty-one, who had been accepted. The extraordinary precaution was also taken of confining the jurors like a gang of prisoners day and night, so that they could not possibly be approached by any outside influence, and of hurrying through the trial at the rate of three sessions a day, and sharply restricting the counsels' every word as only a judge of such exceptional will-power as Judge Barrett could have done. I do not think a single step taken by the court or the prosecuting attorney was irregular, much less unfair. But it was so very unusual as to have the appearance of being arbitrary. And yet it was felt to be an absolute necessity, in order to insure a trial which should not be a farce. The friends of the convicted man are loud in their belief that he would not have been condemned, but for the tacit intimidation of some of the jurymen by the police Inspector. I do not imply that the verdict was not an honest one by honest men. But I can find no such "dissipation of our doubts as to the virtue of our jury system" as the Judge in his charge professed to have found. An exception, so marked for its precautions and peculiarities, only confirms the rule.

The "jury system" is a priori an absurdity. We summon the voting population of a city like this, of whom an immense percentage are of or in sympathy with the criminal classes, to sit in judgment on each other. We call them at random, by lot, to the court-room. We give the culprit the privilege of throwing out from these, as they are drawn, such as will least suit his purposes, in the hope of securing one or more who have been previously "seen," or in whom he recognizes a kindred spirit or the material for the arts of corruption or intimidation. And then we require every one of these twelve men to agree, or the case falls through. Moreover, the verdict must be an absolute one of guilty or not guilty, with no grades or shades of intermediate opinion—a requirement known only to the courts of this country and of England.

I have witnessed very many criminal trials in my day. And as I inspected the mental and moral elements of which the juries were chiefly composed, and the pains which counsel for the defence usually took to exclude all intelligence* or integrity, and their persistent and ingenious efforts to browbeat or obfuscate the residuum, it has been a marvel in my eyes that criminals of pecuniary or political influence were ever convicted. These aldermen, for instance, have been fully up to the average of New York jury material, if not above it so far as their antecedent record is concerned. Who will imagine that their virtue in a jury box would have been more impregnable than in the Common Council? All who have had anything to do with the prosecution of liquor-dealers know how difficult it is to convict on the clearest testimony before a jury, from the fact that at least one will almost always be found on the panel who is either in the liquor interest or afraid of it. No wonder that out of over 1,500 murders committed in a recent year, only ninety-three murderers were executed by law; nor that people aggrieved are more and more tempted to take the law into their own hands, as is shown by the fact that 118 murderers were lynched. Why, if a thief and a perjurer was found among the twelve Apostles of our Lord, who will expect the twelve of an average jury to have not a single false or weak member?

Surely optimism reaches its climax, when it is able to regard our jury system with confidence. And how any theory of human depravity can be consistently held alongside of such confidence, passes understanding. I suppose the truth is, that we all think the same about it in our souls. But the system is so venerable, and identified in our minds with an age when it was one of the bulwarks of popular liberty, as to be a superstition; and no one has much courage or hopefulness for attacking it. And yet I know that I shall relieve many a burdened mind by even this faint and ineffective protest.

In giving his "pedigree" on entering the Sing Sing prison, Jaehne was asked his religion and replied: "Protestant, if anything." We score one in the Alderman's favor for his honest disavowal, and commend his example to the many who persist in their profession of religion while their fingers are clutching dishonest gain, or like Judas fumbling in "the bag." Jaehne, by the way, announced himself as a graduate of the public school, and as having gone to Sunday-school when a boy.

Mr. Beecher is horrified at the continued failure of the young men of the Brooklyn S. S. Union to invite the Unitarian and Universalist schools to join in their annual celebration. And the N. Y. Times says "Mr. Beecher is right," and contrasts his "broad" theology with the "bigoted and ignoble," "contemptible and disgraceful" course of these "narrow young men." Of course, a paper which recommends its Sunday edition as the best preparation for a profitable employment of the Lord's Day, and whose columns all the week are reeking with extended reports of crimes, scandals and obscene trials, would prefer the "broad way" down which Mr. Beecher points as the way to God.

But it would be the height of absurdity and inconsistency for teachers, who are trying to impress upon their pupils that Jesus Christ is the Divine and only Redeemer, and that eternal death is the doom of all who are not found in Him, to give their public recognition and virtual endorsement to those whose special business is to deny both these essential truths. When the Editor of the Times locks arms in a political procession with James G. Blaine, or considers Mr. Gladstone "ignoble" and "contemptible" for not inviting Lord Randolph Churchill into his Cabinet, or wonders why the Chamber of Commerce does not give a public reception to Herr Most and Gustav Schwab, or why the Tract Society does not expose the Sunday Times for sale in the windows of its store, we shall feel like considering its advice. To be "tolerant" is one thing; to be participant is another.

What a curious "mark of respect to the religious feelings" of the community was the general closing of the theatres on Good Friday. I wonder how many of them would keep closed on the Lord's Day, if the law and the police were to withhold their hand. And how eminently respectful to religious feeling are the usual performances, before and behind the curtain, of these establishments!

What a sad case was that of young Reed, the theological student of New Haven, who was found murdered the other day in New York. He is said to have expressed his intention of seeing some of the iniquities of the city for himself, and is supposed to have ventured in disguise on a tour of exploration. If so, it was worse than folly. If the preacher of the Gospel has a dark record of sinful consciousness as to the days before he heard the Saviour say, "Thy sins which are many are forgiven thee," it may impart a realism and intensity to his message. But if not, let him bless God, and remember that it was the tree of the knowledge of good and evil which brought death into our world and all our woe.

While on theological subjects, I must deplore the growing tendency (to which Prof. Drummond has just lent his influence) to "give away" the inspired claims of the Mosaic cosmogony, on the ground that "the Bible was not meant to teach science." Of course, it was not. But when it distinctly states facts, whether of the natural or spiritual world, it must stand or fall by them. Prof. Woodrow, before the Southern General Assembly, fell back on the

* In a famous murder case recently, the foreman did not know how to read. The first proceeding of the jury on retiring was to ask, "Are we all Democrats?" (The case had some political bearing). To reach a decision, they took a part of the evidence given at the Coroner's inquest and a part of that given at the trial, and by combining them arrived at the conclusion that the killing was done in self-defence

Westminster Catechism that "the Scriptures teach only (our version reads "principally," by the way) two things—what man is to believe concerning God, and what duty God requires of man." And he went on to assert that "man can get no positive information in the Bible outside of these things,—it did not attempt to give treatises on geography, medicine, or geology." This remark is both silly and disingenuous. If the Scriptures teach anything which we are "to believe concerning God," it is that He created the heavens and the earth in a certain way and a certain order. There is precisely the same reason for accepting its specific statements of God's methods in creation, as for accepting its specific statements of His methods in redemption.

If others are able to humbly and implicitly receive the Scriptures as the infallible Word of God, while giving up the first chapter of Genesis as a nebulous poetic Ossianism, if not a species of pious fraud, I am glad on that account. But I regard it as a cowardly and a perilous concession. And with the testimony of Guyot and Dana and Dawson and Phillips's Manual in my hand, I denounce it as needless. The Bible is the authenticated record of God, equally with the rocks and fossils of the earth. And the interpretation of the latter, having been forced to correct itself in accordance with the former in nine points, will yet see its way to the unquestioning acceptance of the tenth.

Our Church.

General Synod of the Reformed Church in America.

EIGHTIETH REGULAR SESSION, NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J, 1886

First Day—Wednesday, June 2d.

AFTERNOON, 3 O'CLOCK.—The General Synod met in the First Reformed Church of New Brunswick, N. J. There were present at the opening one hundred and forty-three members—eighty-seven ministers and fifty-six elders—who were called to order and led in prayer by the Rev. J. Howard Suydam, D.D., President of the last Synod. After roll call, the Synod balloted for officers, which resulted in the election of Rev. J. B. Drury, D.D., of Ghent, N. Y., for President, the Rev. Denis Wortman, of Saugerties, N. Y., for Vice-President, and Revs. H. M. Cox and C. E. Lasher for temporary Clerks.

The retiring President extended to Dr. Drury a cordial welcome to the chair, to which he responded:

Retiring President, Fathers and Brethren: Words fail me to express the depth of feeling of which I am conscious as I take the position of responsibility and honor to which you have elected me. Fully do I appreciate the kindness intended by your calling me to this office. But when I think of the responsibility and how inadequate I am to meet it, I feel constrained to trust to your further kindness and to your forbearance.

I need not remind you that we meet in an historic spot. As a Church, we have a history of which we may well be proud. We are also a living Church of the present; as such we are met to take counsel together, and to do the work of to-day, and to make our future worthy of the past. For this we need the help of the Great Master, and the abiding presence of the Holy Spirit.

Again, I thank you for this honor, and I trust you will accord to me your hearty support and help during all the further sessions of this body.

The hours of meeting and adjourning were fixed on, and a committee was appointed on Devotional Exercises, consisting of Rev. Dr. M. H. Hutton, Professor J. Cooper and Elder John Van Cleef. The President and Mrs. Gates, of Rutgers College, invited the members of Synod to a reception at their residence on Thursday evening, which was accepted. The session closed with prayer by Rev. Dr. W. J. R. Taylor.

EVENING, 7.30 O'CLOCK.—A large congregation listened to the sermon by the last President, Rev. J. Howard Suydam, D.D., from the text, John 8: 12, "I am the light of the world." The following abstract gives an inadequate idea of the deep thoughtfulness, fine diction, and glowing fervor of the discourse, which held to the close the eager attention of each hearer:

According to the intent of a sermon on such an occasion as this, I emphasize these words of Jesus, "I am the Light of the World," in a few directions, as the exigency of the times seems to demand.

Jesus never uttered an unmeaning word. "The World" stands for its human inhabitants, and Christ as "The Light," by what He did, by what He was and by what He taught,—is to the moral and the spiritual what the sun is to the material earth.

This light was ever in the world. "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." "In the beginning was the Word." The Word is the expression of God. Christ is the Word as well as the Light. Hence Christ was when the world became.

The light was diffused by the Spirit. Many antediluvians walked in its rays. It extended beyond the circumcision. What we regard as sporadic examples may have represented a great multitude. Balaam and Nebuchadnezzar, the Centurion at the Cross, and Cornelius and such so-called "outside saints," were in possession of some degree of this light.

It was developed and more concentrated in the Jewish Church, and was manifested in the prophecies. Any attempt to explain these, leaving out the Christ, will prove a failure.

Like the sun, this light reveals, revives and reforms.

It reveals what is vital. History is interesting and profitable, and science equally so when we seek for the genesis of things, going back to what is claimed by some as the "protoplasm—that primeval germ dropped upon our planet by a truant aerolite." But to know our destiny is not merely of interest—it is vital. And this light reveals immortality, and an immortality of blessedness and the way to its realization.

The most potent factors in the world to-day are the Church, education and the industries. This light shines to give hope to the soul, character to the mind, and righteousness to the conduct. Christ has to do with humanity. This light must involve education; otherwise a lawless power is let loose upon society. The college needs to include it in its curriculum; the press to receive its influence so as to lead rather than to follow public sentiment; the common school becomes a dangerous institution if the masses are trained without the knowledge of God's will. "High intellectual power must be directed by high moral principle."

This light alone will solve the problem of labor; for it recognizes the rights of the individual. In this regard our Republic stands foremost of the nations. Mr. Bancroft in a recent address says, "that ours is the oldest of all the governments in the civilized world." Others have been revolutionized, and for the purpose of recognizing the rights of the individual.

The Gospel makes honest workmen. It puts conscience into labor. The Golden Rule will settle all difficulties. Philanthropy, philosophy, statemanship and religion unite in this.

The above was expounded and illustrated, and the preacher concluded substantially as follows:

Brethren, in this general way, I have carried out my design to indicate a few avenues into which the Christ-light, in its proper and wide signification, should be made to shine, in order to produce its revealing, reviving, and reforming effects.

And this is timely. We certainly need to hold up the Christ as revealing immortality and salvation when a materialistic philosophy is at the full tide of influence, as that includes the denial of a personal God, and of the distinction between right and wrong; and as it inculcates annihilation irrespective of character, and reduces man to an animated machine, and teaches that enjoyment is the chief end of human existence.

We need, too, to emphasize anew the truth that the "World," of which Christ is the "Light," includes the inhabitants of all lands, to look again at our marching orders, when many, within the Church, hold and teach that the work of foreign missions involves a useless expenditure of men and means, meanwhile forgetting that if the early Christians had held and practised the same view, they would now be counted among the pagans.

It becomes imperative to enforce the lesson of the text in order that the educated mind, which controls legislation and diplomacy, may regard it as essential to all the proceedings affecting the public weal, so that justice may take precedence of policy, and that the relations of the strong and the weak may reverse the ancient theory, too long in practice, that "might makes right."....

And should not a proper interpretation of the passage, taken in connection with the Great Commission, cause us honestly to inquire whether it be worth the while to insist upon such a conformity to each and every article of creeds and standards as to prevent a larger coöperation with other denominations which hold the essentials of the Gospel?....

The present is the age of the people. Their struggle is to attain to the full conditions of humanity. The Church is to minister to this. Christ is the luknos—the great unlighted, unexpiring luminary. Each of us is a lampas—a torch. We derive our light from Him. We are commanded to "let it shine." Each one is to be "a Leyden jar of spiritual force from which, to all that comes in contact with it, irradiating glory flashes."

In Guild Hall there is a bombastic monument which says that it was Chatham who made commerce to flourish by war. It is an ignoble epitaph, though Burke himself wrote it. It remains for the Church to prove that the light of Christ, "which has elevated mankind through a progressive civilization for eighteen centuries," is still the most effective force, and that "all other attempts in the future as in the past, will, at best, but puzzle the brain."

That noble statue of a female figure soon to be erected in the harbor of New York, the generous gift of the French people to our republic, rising to its majestic height, her brow encircled with a coronet of burning stars, and holding in her outstretched hand a torch fired by the lightning, is well named "Liberty Enlightening the World." It will be the first thing visible to every immigrant. It will speak to him of blessings in the way of physical comfort, of opportunity and privileges for himself and his children, which in his old home of caste and poverty only existed in his imagination. It is for the Church, for each and every minister of Christ, for each and every member of His mystical body, by the contact of faith, to take from Him the light which, in a higher and truer sense, and including all lesser blessings, shall lighten every man that cometh into the world.

"In thy light shall we see light," says the Psalmist; light for all of duty, revealing the way, relieving of its burdens; light for all mystery, if not to inform, yet, with faith, to keep us in a condition of hopeful expectancy; light in the time of affliction enabling to endure and giving an assurance of a blessed outcome; light in the grave to which we hasten, causing to see through it and to discern the glory beyond; and light in heaven, for not only does Christ say, "I am the light of the world," but it is also revealed, "The Lamb is the light thereof."

Second Day—Thursday, June 3d.

MORNING, 9 O'CLOCK.—The first half-hour was spent in devotional services, conducted by President Drury.

The Stated Clerk, Rev. Dr. Paul D. Van Cleef, being too ill to attend the Synod, on motion, Rev. Dr. W. H. Ten Eyck was appointed acting Stated Clerk, and Rev. Daniel Van Pelt acting Permanent Clerk.

The Rev. W. J. R. Taylor, D.D., offered the following, which was unanimously adopted: The General Synod, having been informed of the illness of its Stated Clerk, the Rev. Paul D. Van Cleef, D.D., it is

"Resolved, That the Synod hereby expresses its tender sympathy with our brother in his affliction, its gratification in his progress toward recovery, and its hope and prayer that, by the Lord's good will, he may be speedily and entirely restored to his usefulness in the service of his own pastorate and of the Church at large."

The President appointed and the Synod adopted the following

Judge P. S. Danforth, Chairman of Special Committee on the South Reformed Church of West Troy, N. Y., reported that their efforts to adjust the difficulties there had been so far of no avail. The report was accepted and the committee continued, and, by resolution, empowered to effect such adjustment, or to take such other measures to secure what is just and equitable in the premises, as in the discretion of the committee may seem best.

The Rev. W. W. Barr, D.D., of the Presbytery of Philadelphia, was introduced to the Synod as a corresponding delegate from the United Presbyterian Church. Pleasant words of Christian salutation were exchanged by Rev. Dr. Barr and President Drury.

The afternoon was occupied by the Synod with the administration of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. Rev. Dr. Wortman, Vice-President, presided, and Rev. Dr. W. R. Davis and Rev. Peter Moerdyke made addresses. It was a season greatly enjoyed.

Evening, 7 o'clock.—The annual meeting of the Alumni Association of the Theological Seminary was held. The President, Rev. Dr. W. H. Ten Eyck, called the meeting to order, and prayer was offered by Rev. George J. Van Neste. The following officers for the ensuing year were chosen: President, Rev. George J. Van Neste; Vice President, Rev. P. H. Milliken; Secretary and Treasurer, Rev. James Lefevre; Corresponding Secretary, Rev. D. D. Demarest, D.D.; Orator, primarius, Rev. P. M. Doolittle; secundus, Rev. F. S. Schenck; Necrologist for the Particular Synod of New York, Rev. C. I. Shepard; for the Particular Synod of Albany, Rev. J. B. Drury, D.D.; for the Particular Synod of New Brunswick, Rev. James Lefevre; for the Particular Synod of Chicago, Rev. A. P. Peeke.

The committee appointed at the last annual meeting to make arrangements for holding the meetings at the time of the closing exercises of the Theological Seminary, reported that they had submitted a communication to the Board of Superintendents, requesting that the examinations be extended to Thursday noon, giving the afternoon of Thursday to the Association, and having the closing exercises of the Seminary on Thursday evening instead of Wednesday as at present; that the Board of Superintendents granted the request, by unanimous vote, and referred the matter to General Synod for approval.

The report was adopted; also the following:

Resolved, That a programme for the annual meeting be as follows: 1. A collation to be given in the dining room of Hertzog Hall at 2 o'clock P. M. 2. A business meeting of the Association in the chapel at 3 o'clock. 3. The annual address to be delivered in one of the churches of the city at 4 o'clock. 4. That a committee, consisting of Alumni residing at or near New Brunswick, be appointed to make all the necessary arrangements.

In compliance with the last resolution the chair appointed Professor J. G. Lansing, Rev. Dr. M. H. Hutton, and Rev. J. P. Searle. It was moved that General Synod be petitioned for an appropriation of $50 to defray the expenses of the annual meeting. Carried.

The Treasurer reported receipts $43.71, including cash on hand at the beginning of the year; disbursements $15, balance $28.71. Adjourned with the Lord's Prayer.

The Synod then proceeded in a body to the residence of President and Mrs. Merrill E. Gates to enjoy their reception.

Third Day—Friday, June 4th

Morning, 9 o'clock.—The usual half hour of prayer was conducted by Rev. T. W. Jones. Vice-President Rev. Dr. Denis Wortman took the chair, and the Synod proceeded to business. Yesterday's journal was read and approved. After the transaction of some routine business, the Rev. C. L. Wells, D.D., chairman of the special committee appointed at the last Synod on the rearrangement of the Lemmata, reported. The report was adopted. Among other changes it dispenses with the Committee on Nominations and leaves the nominations to be made by the committees of the several Boards. It also provides that the Lord's Supper be administered in the evening instead of on the afternoon of the second day.

The committee appointed by the last General Synod to examine the Revised Version of the English Bible, and to report to the next Synod whether it is wise and expedient to recommend the same for use in public worship, or private, or both, reported through Rev. M. H. Hutton, D.D.:

We have carefully considered the subject referred to us. While we recognize the merits of the Revised Version, as giving in many places a more exact rendering of the original Scriptures than the one now in use, and therefore well worthy to be studied by our ministers and people, we are yet of the opinion that the time has not yet come for such a Synodical recommendation of it as a whole, as the resolution appointing the committee would seem to contemplate.

As we are informed, there has been up to this time no action in regard to the Revised Version by the Anglican Convocation of Canterbury—the body with which the Revision movement originated.

We are also told by one of the Revisers that it is possible that the Convocation may refer the work back to the companies of Revisers for specific modification, or for a final standard edition. We also learn that there are still some important unadjusted differences between the English and the American companies. The latter have resolved to keep up their organization, and to continue their work by perfecting their appendix. When finally matured, it is to be sent to the English Universities for such use as they may choose to make of it. But, whatever its fate in England, it will be in some way utilized for an American standard edition of the Revised Version.

Under these circumstances we think that our proper course is to wait the issue of events, before there is any formal Synodical action on the subject. At the same time we deem that it would be quite proper for Synod to urge all our ministers, and all our members who are familiar with the original languages of Scripture to make the Revised Version as it now is, or as it may be modified hereafter, the subject of careful study, so that when the proper time arrives for Synodical action, the voice of the General Synod will be substantially the voice of our whole Church.

Meanwhile, as we are not aware of any act of General Synod requiring the exclusive use of our present Version in the public services of the Church, your Committee are of opinion that our pastors are at perfect liberty to make such use of the Revised Version in the pulpit or elsewhere, as they may deem proper.

J. Forsyth,
D. D. Demarest,
Mancius H. Hutton,
Merrill E. Gates."

The report was adopted.

Rev. Dr. Hutton stated that the other members of the committee, Rev. Dr. Van Gieson, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and Rev. Dr. Collier, of Kinderhook, N.Y., approved the report, though their signatures were not affixed to it.

Afternoon, 2.30 o'clock.—The Committee on Accounts rendered a partial report, recommending that the Stated Clerk of General Synod be relieved from the duties of his office for one year, and that his salary be continued for that period; also that the acting stated and permanent clerks each be paid the salaries usual to those offices.

A statement was received from the Board of Domestic Missions relating to the defalcation of their ex Treasurer, John R. Smith, amounting to about $25,000, which on motion was referred to a special committee consisting of Elders D. S. Danforth, Wm. Bogardus, W. H. Jackson, Ernest Miller and Hiram Garretson.

Professor Jacob Cooper was elected Vedder Lecturer for 1888.

Evening, 7:30.—The Chairman of the Committee on Correspondence, Rev. W. R. Duryee, D.D., reported that they had received the credentials of the Rev. W. W. Barr, D.D., as delegate from the General Assembly of the United Presbyterian Church of North America, who placed in the hands of the committee a letter conveying the Christian salutations and regards of the Church he represented; a letter conveying the salutations of the Christian Reformed Church in the Netherlands; a report from the Rev. W. J. R. Taylor, delegate to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, stating that he had conveyed the salutations of our General Synod to that body at its late session in Augusta, Georgia; a report from the Rev. C. L. Wells, D.D., delegate to the General Assembly of the United Presbyterian Church of North America, stating that he had attended the meeting of the Assembly at Hamilton, Ohio, May 27, 1886; that he had been cordially received and had addressed the Assembly; letter from Rev. Samuel M. Ramsey conveying the fraternal greetings of the General Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church; also, a report from the Rev. L. Dykstra, delegate to the Reformed Church in the United States.

The committee recommended the following as delegates to Corresponding Bodies: To the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America—Rev. A. V. V. Raymond, primarius; Rev. W. R. Taylor, secundus.

To the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States (South)—Rev. John A. De Baun, primarius; Rev. Henry M. Cox, secundus.

To the General Assembly of the United Presbyterian Church of North America—Rev. John A. Todd, primarius; Rev. C. W. Fritts, secundus.

To the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada—Rev. John W. Beardslee, primarius; Rev. J. G. Smart, secundus.

To the General Council of the Reformed Episcopal Church—Rev. Carlos Martyn, primarius; Rev. J. Elmendorf, secundus.

To the Reformed Church in the United States—Rev. L. Dykstra, primarius; Rev. John Van der Meulen, secundus.

To the General Synod of the Evangelical Lutheran Church—Rev. Peter De Bruyn, primarius; Rev. Peter Moerdyke, secundus.

Rev. Dr. D. D. Demarest presented a report on a critical edition of the Constitution, which was ordered printed, and made the special order for Tuesday morning.

The committee on judicial business reported, recommending that the appeal from the Classis of Philadelphia against the action of the Particular Synod of New Brunswick be taken up. The report was accepted and adopted, and made the special order of the day Monday afternoon.

Fourth Day—Saturday, June 5th.

Morning, 9 o'clock.—After the half hour of prayer the president of the Synod, Rev. J. B. Drury, D.D., took the chair. The Committee on Devotional Exercises and Pulpit Supplies reported the appointments for the supply of the pulpits of New Brunswick for the coming Sabbath. A committee was appointed, with Rev. J. G. Smart as chairman, to secure a place for the holding of the next meeting of the General Synod. There being no further business ready for the attention of Synod, it adjourned to 10.30 o'clock Monday morning.

Synodical Notes.

....A pleasant episode of Friday morning's session was the reading of a letter, addressed to the General Synod, from a venerable father of the church, the Rev. James Demarest of Lancaster, Wis., who is in the ninetieth year of his age and fifty-seventh of his ministry. The letter was beautifully worded, and marked by a spirit of refreshing tenderness, simplicity and love. It was received by the Synod with expressions of profound respect.

....While the ballots were being cast which elected to the Presidency of the General Synod the Rev. J. B. Drury D.D., he received a telegram informing him of the death by drowning of a youth of his congregation, and playmate of Dr. Drury's eldest son, who was in bathing with him at the time of the accident and nearly lost his own life in endeavoring to save his comrade. Between the honor conferred and the sad news received almost at the same moment, Dr Drury was placed in a peculiarly trying position, in which however, he showed unusual self-possession, which perhaps would have been a surprise to the Synod and called forth their sympathy if they had been aware of the circumstances. The telegram summoned Dr. Drury to attend the funeral of the unfortunate boy. This required his absence from Synod till Saturday morning.

....The reception on Thursday evening by President and Mrs. Merrill E. Gates was an occasion which will linger long in the memory of all who were fortunate enough to be present, as a pleasant entertainment. The Synod gathered at 8 o'clock in front of the Old First Church and proceeded in a body to Dr. Gates' residence. There were also present many invited guests from the citizens of New Brunswick. The members of the Synod were introduced one by one to Dr. and Mrs. Gates, by Drs. J. Howard Suydam and Denis Wortman, Vice-President of Synod. This ceremony over the company mingled socially for some time, when they were invited to partake of ice cream, strawberries and other refreshments. It was after 10 o'clock when the company dispersed, grateful to their esteemed host and hostess for the delightful hours which, through their courtesy, they had enjoyed.

....On Friday afternoon, by invitation, the Synod visited in a body the College and Seminary. Marching up from the Church they first assembled in Kirkpatrick Chapel, where Dr. Gates, in a neat address, welcomed the Synod to the historic and classic shades of "Old Rutgers." After a response to the hearty welcome, in Dr. Wortman's happiest vein, the Synod was conducted through the various buildings, and through the courtesy of Professors Cook, Doolittle, Van Dyck and Merriman, given a taste of the methods of instruction pursued in the Institution. A most favorable impression was made upon every member who availed himself of the privilege extended by the kindness of the President and Faculty. The Seminary grounds and building were also visited with equal pleasure and satisfaction, the professors receiving the Synod with great cordiality.

....KINDERHOOK, N. Y.—Sunday, May 30th, was a memorable day for the church. Thirty-two were received on confession. Most, though not all, were the fruits of a recent work of grace. All ages were represented from nine to about eighty. In one case an entire family of four, parents and children, stood side by side. Eleven were heads of families. Eighteen were from the Sunday-school. A striking fact is the closing of the bar of the principal hotel of the village; an act most creditable to all concerned. The harvest is not all gathered in. In the special services, which began in February and lasted six weeks, valuable aid was rendered by neighboring pastors and especially by Rev. Mr. Veenschoten of, Greenport. The old mother of churches is prospering in every respect; and some of us believe that steady growth in beneficence has not a little to do with it. P.

....SCHOHARIE, N. Y.—On the last Sunday in May voluntary and confidential subscriptions were obtained for a parsonage, the pastor, Rev. John G. Smart, alone knowing what each one gave. Only half of the families were represented in the contributions, and it was estimated that nearly half the wealth of the congregation was unrepresented, many not having received the circular letter and subscription card which were sent out by mail only the Thursday previous. The total subscription was $1,922,60. The architect is now engaged on the plans and the contract will be advertised for as soon as they are ready.

....KERHONKSON, ULSTER CO., N. Y., JUNE 1ST.—The appeal for the boatmen on the canal, made in the INTELLIGENCER of April 7th, has had a generous response and there is probably more to come. We have received as follows: From a lady in New York, the Robert Raikes' Library of S. S. Union, 50 vols.; Mrs. C. H. Knox, N. Y., bundle of papers; A. M. Gleason, Peekskill, N. Y., box of books, magazines and papers; I. C. Christie, Paterson, N. J., magazines and papers; Mrs. A., Poughkeepsie, N. Y., box of books, magazines and papers; D. R. Hitchcock, StatenIsland, bundles of papers, Christian Heralds, etc; T. R. H., two bundles of papers; Rev. D. R. Lente, Washingtonville, N. Y., bundle of papers; Mrs. Geo. B. Walbridge, Plainfield, N. J., 80 cents, balance of arbutus order; a bundle of books and papers from a person unknown, and several bundles of papers from unknown persons.

The papers have been given out every day to every passing boat. The last were given on Saturday.

We have about 100 volumes in paper covers. These are being distributed now to those who will return them.

We have also about 50 bound volumes, which will be catalogued and loaned to those who will make a good use of them.

Many thanks to the kind donors. We can use papers with profit constantly.

W. B. DARRACH, Pastor of Reformed Church.

....HOLLAND, MICH.—The scholars of the Sabbath-school of the First Church have presented an organ to the new church building.

....FOR EUROPE.—The Rev. Messrs P. Moerdyke, J. W. Beardslee and D. Van Pelt, expect to sail by the Dutch steamer "W. A. Scholten," on the 19th of this month, for a short visit to the Netherlands. Many kind wishes and prayers attend them.

....THE REV. H. DOSKER, of Grand Haven, Mich, who has put the church under obligations by his clear account of the present dissensions in the Reformed Church of the Netherlands, has leave of absence from his congregation for six weeks, which he expects to spend in this city and State.

....THE HISTORY OF EIGHTY YEARS is the title of a handsome illustrated volume containing an account of the services attending the opening last autumn of the new Bloomingdale Church of this city. The Historical Discourse, delivered on Sunday, November 1st, 1885, by the pastor, Rev. Carlos Martyn, at the first regular service in the new building, holds properly the place of honor. The history is told with animation and in a sympathetic spirit, and will be read with enjoyment and benefit. The report of the Dedication Service on Thursday evening, October 22d, follows the history, and is succeeded by a full account of the Service of Fellowship, held on Sunday afternoon, October 25th, when congratulations were offered by ministers of various denominations. There are lists of officers from the beginning, of the present membership, and of the organizations for charitable and social ends. The illustrations of the old and new church buildings, of the first parsonage, and of the farm house of Jacob Harsen in which the church was organized, are well executed.

....THE CLASSIS OF ULSTER met in the Church of Shokan, N. Y., June 1st, 1886. The special business for which Classis was called was the examination of the licentiate, J. T. Bergen, with a view of his settlement as pastor of the churches of Shokan and Shandaken. The examination being sustained, Mr. Bergen was ordained to the work of the Gospel ministry. The call made on the candidate having been approved, and due notice given to the congregations according to the requirements of the Constitution, the Classis proceeded to the installation. The President of Classis, Rev. A. A. Zabriskie, presided and conducted the preliminary services. Rev. Dr. C. Van Santvoord preached the sermon from Hebrews 4:2, "But the word preached did not profit them," etc. The President read the form and also the charges to pastor and people. The benediction was pronounced by the newly-installed pastor.

A call made on the Rev. J. H. Van Doren by the Church of Esopus was approved. The Rev. F. F. Wilson was dismissed to the Classis of Poughkeepsie. The following action was taken in reference to the death of the Rev. James F. King:

Whereas, The Classis of Ulster has this day learned of the death of the Rev. James F. King, a member of this Classis, and pastor of the Reformed Church of Roxbury, therefore

Resolved, That we take this occasion to put upon record our appreciation of his earnest and pure Christian character, his ability as a minister of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and his beautiful consecration to the work to which he had given his life. We shall remember him as a holy as well as an able minister of the New Testament.

Resolved, That we regard this Providence as a fresh admonition, addressed to us who remain in the harvest field, to work while it is day and devote ourselves with renewed earnestness to the great cause of the Redeemer entrusted to our hands.

Resolved, That we convey to the bereaved household of our brother the assurance of our condolence and sympathy, and invoke in their behalf the supporting grace of the God of all consolation.

Resolved, That we also extend to the Church of Roxbury our sympathies in this hour of their affliction, when they find themselves bereaved of a much beloved and highly valued pastor, while, at the same time, we remind them that the Church of Christ does not fail when its servants are called to their reward, but that God's Providence will keep guard over all its interests, and respond to His people's faithfulness by fidelity to His own promises.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the family of our deceased brother and to the Church of Roxbury, and that they also be printed in THE CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER. S. C.

....HOPE COLLEGE.—The Commencement exercises will be as follows:

Sunday, June 20th, at 7.30 o'clock, P.M., Baccalaureate sermon in Hope Church by Rev. R. N. Steele, D.D., of Ann Arbor, Mich.

Monday, June 21st, at 2.30 o'clock, P.M., Rhetorical exercises of the Grammar School in the Chapel, and at 7.30 o'clock, P.M., the inauguration of Rev. Charles Scott, D.D., as President of the College in the Third Reformed Church. Sermon by Rev. Wm. J. R. Taylor, D.D., of Newark, N. J.

Tuesday, June 22d, at 10.30 o'clock, A.M., the regular annual meeting of the Council. At 7.30 o'clock, P.M., the meeting of the Alumni in the Chapel.

Wednesday, June 23d, at 7.30 o'clock, P.M., in Hope Church, the Commencement.

The examinations of the Undergraduate Classes begin on Wednesday, June 16th, at 8.30 o'clock, A.M.

A cordial invitation is extended to all the friends of the College. CHARLES SCOTT, President.

...HOLMDEL, N. J., WOMEN'S MISSIONARY MEETING.—It was not a very bright morning on the last Thursday in May. It rained some and threatened more. Notice of the meeting had been given throughout the Classis. It was the first attempt that had been made in the Classis to hold such a meeting. The hour came and the meeting was called to order. The attendance was creditable considering the weather—most of the neighboring churches were represented. The women, as their right, held their meeting in the morning hours. Mrs. Dr. H. G. Cooke, President of the Society, took the chair and introduced the speakers. The meeting was addressed by Miss Anderson, of Fordham, N. Y., and Mrs. Horten, of Staten Island. The audience was instructed and much gratified.

A choice and bountiful collation was then served in the chapel near by, and under brightening skies the attendance increased for the afternoon service, when Rev. J. W. Warnshuis, of Alton, Iowa, spoke at some length of the condition of the Northwestern Territories as mission fields, inviting culture and promising early fruits. He was followed in a few remarks by Rev. H. Boggis, missionary at the Highlands, after which the company separated. All felt that the day had been profitably spent. W. R.

....NYACK, N. Y.—The semi-centennial anniversary of the dedication of the Reformed church and beginning of its year of jubilee will be observed on June 17th, with services at 2.30 o'clock in the afternoon and 7.30 in the evening. The Rev. Charles S. Hageman, D.D., will deliver the historical discourse in the afternoon. At the evening service addresses will be delivered by the pastors of the fifty years. The Rev. Cornelius Brett will represent his father, the first pastor, the Rev. Drs. Hageman, Lord, Van Zandt and W. H. Clark, and the Rev. H. V. Voorhees are expected to be present and to speak. The Choral Society of Nyack will furnish the music. The occasion promises to be one of great interest. N.

Commencement Week, Rutgers, 1886.

SUNDAY, JUNE 20.—The Baccalaureate Sermon in the Second Reformed Church, at 7.30 P.M., by the Rev. Wesley R. Davis, D.D., Pastor of the Madison Avenue Reformed Church, of Albany, N. Y.

Monday, June 21.—Entrance Examinations, written, from 10 A.M. Class Day Exercises at 3 P.M., in Kirkpatrick Chapel. Glee Club Concert in the Opera House, at 8 P.M.

Tuesday, June 22.—Entrance Examinations continued. Meeting of Trustees, 10 A.M. Meeting of the Alumni in Kirkpatrick Chapel, at 10 A.M. At 12 M., Art Presentation by Edward S. Vail, Esq. Immediately after this, Address before the Alumni, by Prof. Alexander Johnston, of Princeton, N. J., class of 1870. Subject, "The New Political Philosophy." Collation in the Armory at 1 P.M.

At 3.30 P.M., Address before the Literary Societies in Kirkpatrick Chapel, by Hon. Charles E. Fitch, LL.D., editor of the Rochester Democrat, Regent of the University of New York. Subject, "Journalism as a Profession." After the address, meeting of the Societies in their halls, and classes of the Alumni in the rooms specified.

Junior Exhibition in the evening at the Opera House, at 8 o'clock.

Wednesday, June 23.—Commencement. The procession will form at 9.30 on the College Campus. Alumni and friends of the College are invited to join it. A sufficient number of the best seats will be reserved for those who are in the procession. Exercises begin in the hall at 10 A.M.

In the evening, the President's Reception, at his house. All Alumni of Rutgers are invited to attend it.

Rev. James Foster King.

LAST week's INTELLIGENCER contained a brief notice of the death of this young and devoted servant of Christ, but it seems due to the glory of that grace in which he trusted and to the tender memories that he left behind him, that we lay upon his new-made grave a further tribute of our love and conscious loss.

Our young brother was born in Bloomfield, N. J., but removed at an early age to the upper part of our city, which continued to be his home till he entered upon his work in the Gospel ministry. Early in life he became deeply impressed with religious conviction, which gradually ripened into genuine conversion, and when but fourteen years of age he publicly united with St. Paul's Reformed Church. The ardor with which he engaged in Christian work, especially among young men, endeared him greatly to the Church, and will remain a blessing to it and the most enduring monument to his memory.

From the time of his conversion his hope and purpose were fixed on the Gospel ministry. For its work he was highly endowed both by grace and nature, and well equipped by long and faithful study. With great promise he entered the field, but only a single year of active service was granted him as pastor of the Reformed Church of Roxbury, N. Y. But the impressions that he left and the esteem in which he was held during this short ministry are best attested by the patient waiting of his people and their ardent prayers for him during his year of illness, and their sorrowing hearts at his death.

In him we can truly say were united profound and varied attainments, the fervor of an evangelist, the piety of a saint, the simplicity and sweetness of a child. High hopes were built on him, warm affections began to cluster around him; but in the bloom of his young manhood he is called away. We know not now the wherefore,—that we shall know hereafter; but this we do know, that to him the change is from a transitory world to an incorruptible inheritance.

The religion that he commended with lip and life sustained him when flesh and heart failed him, and shed unclouded light on his passage to the unseen world. At the hour of death for a moment he revived, spoke words of comfort and strength to weeping loved ones, and fell sweetly asleep in Jesus.

"Turn we to yonder clime of cloudless light,
Where the redeemed their crowns of glory wear,
Their palms of victory, their robes of white,
And know he lives with Christ forever there.
Know that he shines a jewel in His crown,
Know that the songs of triumph louder swell;
Then let us lay each selfish murmur down,
Then let the grieved heart answer, 'It is well.'"

H. D. B.

Captain Walter Bicker.

CAPTAIN BICKER, whose reminiscences of this city as it was at the beginning of this century and of the battle of Plattsburgh have been so acceptable to our readers, died on Thursday last at his residence at Far Rockaway, Long Island. He was in his 91st year and died really from old age. The remarkable mental strength and clearness which was exhibited in the papers written recently, continued to the very end. He was conscious to the last moment. His early life has been so minutely described by himself to our readers that very little remains to be said in regard to it. He was one of the very few connecting links between the original Dutch settlers of this city and the present generation. His parents were born in the Netherlands and came to this city in the latter part of the last century. His father was one of the founders of the Society of the Cincinnati. The family, in the direct line, is now nearly extinct. After faithful and honorable service in the army, he resigned his commission and entered into business in this city. His residence was in Brooklyn, and he transferred his membership to the First Church of that city, where he was a useful member and an elder for many years. His funeral was held on Saturday morning in the Church-on-the-Heights, Rev. Mr. Hutton, the pastor, and Rev. A. R. Thompson, D.D., officiating. As none of the surface cars were running, a number of his friends, now well advanced in years, were unable to be present. Captain Bicker was a courteous gentleman of the old school, intelligent, an agreeable companion, a conscientious Christian, and an ardent patriot. It is fortunate for us who survive him that during the last three months he put on record so large and so interesting a part of his recollections of the men and events of the early years of this city.

Our Contributors.

It Might Have Been.

GOD might have made no gentle flowers
To beautify this world of ours,
And scatter on the summer air
Their wondrous perfume everywhere.

Instead of skies of lovely blue,
They might have borne some gloomy hue,
As though they wore a constant frown,
On us, in anger, looking down.

The grass, now of a pleasant green,
With starry dandelions between,
God could have given some color bright,
Too dazzling for our feeble sight.

And He who sends no gift in vain
Could make mere avenues to pain
Each delicate and subtile sense,
By breath of His omnipotence.

If He had spoken one little word,
Nor air had thrilled with song of bird
Nor butterfly with wings so bright
Had sported in the golden light;

And all the pleasant sights and sounds
With which this love-crowned earth abounds,
Our eyes, alas, had never seen,
Nor ears had heard.—It might have been. E. V. S.

Mrs. Grey's Sacrifice.

BY KATE S. GATES.

MRS. GREY drew a little breath of pure content as she stood by the cheerful grate fire in her cosy little library. She had just finished her morning's work of putting the parlors to rights.

"I believe," she said softly to herself, "that I am just as near being perfectly happy as it is possible for anyone to be. I ought to be content, certainly, with such a dear, good husband and pleasant home."

Then, having assured herself that everything was in order for the day, she ran upstairs to her own room and took up her Bible for her morning chapter. It was in Malachi. She wished, as she opened to her place, that it was in one of the Gospels or Epistles. Those were written for everybody as long as the world should last, but she never thought of finding any special word for her own life in the Old Testament. She read it because it was a part of the Bible, and she thought that she must.

So now this morning, as she read, her thoughts were not on her reading, but downstairs, wondering what kind of a spread would be prettiest for the little stand in the back parlor, and if the new statuette would not look better between the two front windows.

Suddenly she stopped. What was that she had just read?

"And if ye offer the blind for sacrifice, is it not evil? and if ye offer the lame and sick, is it not evil? Offer it now unto thy governor, will he be pleased with thee or accept thy person? saith the Lord of hosts."

Her Bible slipped from her hands as she sat gazing into the fire.

What kind of sacrifices and offerings had she brought to God? His gifts to her had been rich and plentiful; what had she offered unto Him?

"The more John does for me the more I want to do for him," she thought, with crimsoning cheeks. "I just try to think of things to please him, and to do for him, but I am afraid it isn't so about God. I don't see as I've given anything but old clothes that we could spare as well as not, and the regular contributions, but then I spend twice as much for things I do not really need.

"I gave myself to God, of course, a long time ago, but I am afraid that has been anything but a perfect offering. And I do believe," she exclaimed in her earnestness, "that, imperfect as I am, instead of giving the best of myself to God I have given it to John, to society, and to my own pleasure.

"I never would have gone into any evening company as tired and worn out as I went to last Thursday evening's meeting.

"Oh, dear! if the Lord was displeased with His people in those days, what must He be with me?"

It was with a very penitent, humble heart that Mrs. Grey knelt to plead for pardon and help for the future.

She had an errand down town that morning. On her way home she met Dr. Rogers. She knew him slightly; he was a member of the church they attended, but she was not prepared for his bright smile of greeting and outstretched hand.

"I believe the Lord sent you to me," he said. "I was just asking him to show me some one for teacher in the Foundry Mission School. Won't you and your husband each take a class? I was almost in despair, for we are so short of workers just now; but I could not make up my mind to give up the field, for the harvest is plenteous."

Mrs. Grey was on the point of refusing decidedly, when suddenly her morning's reading flashed into her mind.

Here was a chance for a genuine sacrifice, for the mission school held its session Sabbath afternoon, the only afternoon in the week when John was home, and they did enjoy it so! To be sure, it would not take all the afternoon, but it would spoil it.

"It wasn't," she pleaded with herself, "as though they spent the time as some did, riding, paying or receiving visits. To think of giving up those nice long talks and hours of Bible study together for teaching those rough foundry boys and girls! No, she could not," she decided, as she hurried along. She wanted to get as far away from that troublesome doctor as possible.

And yet should she always offer unto the Lord that which cost her nothing, that which was cast off—like her last winter's cloak that she gave to a poor woman last week, that which was left over from everything else?

A sudden sense of bitter shame at her own ingratitude swept over Mrs. Grey. He, the Lord of hosts, had redeemed her; He had filled her cup of blessings full and running over. Could she refuse anything?

The hot tears sprang to her eyes, and turning, she rapidly retraced her steps to Dr. Rogers' office, to say, "We will take the classes if you are willing. I can promise for my husband without waiting to ask him. He is always ready to do his duty, and I hope I shall be in the future."

The Seventh Day and the Sabbath Day.

BY REV. DANIEL VAN PELT.

IT has always seemed to us scarcely worth while to spend any time in discussing the question as to the day on which the Sabbath should be observed. But a whole denomination has seen fit to secede from the regular Baptist communion to call themselves Seventh-Day Baptists. And people of various denominations have discovered that a vital principle or doctrine is somehow involved in fixing on the seventh instead of the first day of the week, and manage to run a periodical, The Outlook, as the exponent of their views. Hence, if only out of respect for the scruples of brethren, the matter of the day may well claim our attention.

A first and obvious answer at once suggests itself; and this is, that it is the very genius and glory of Christianity to lead the thought away from mere externals to the all-important essentials within them or beneath them. And what is the essential thing about the Sabbath; its observance or its day? "Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work." Suppose, now, we do that, and we observe the Sabbath day before we do the six days' work, or after it; do we not in either case observe a seventh day, i. e., one day out of seven?

If, however, only the strictly literal interpretation of this law is valid, then we fall into a most unfortunate predicament. We shall find it utterly impossible to keep the Fourth Commandment! All the way from the seventh day that God signalized by His rest from creation, the seventh day must come down without interruption or mistake to our times. Suppose that from Adam to Noah there never was a mistake made; suppose Noah kept a correct account in the ark; suppose in the family from which Abraham sprang a growing idolatry did not prevent a miscalculation as to the Sabbath; suppose amid the oppressive tyranny of Egyptian bondage the Israelites did not omit the consecration of the seventh day by a cessation from labor through all those four hundred years; suppose that during those thirty eight years of aimless wandering in the wilderness, when so essential a ceremony as the circumcision was allowed to fall into desuetude, the seventh day was never neglected; suppose that when the King Josiah found a copy of the law and looked upon it as a long-lost treasure, there had been through all those years, in the course of which it had been lost to memory, no uncertainty at all as to the seventh day. Let it be granted, still further, that during the seventy years' captivity in Babylon, and the confusion of the successive conquests and partial burnings that preceded it, there was no difficulty whatever about fixing upon the exact seventh day; and that after the return from captivity, during the persecutions of the Seleucidæ and the guerilla warfare of the Maccabean times, that down to the birth of Christ, and after the destruction of Jerusalem and the dispersion of the Jews, the Jews had still always correctly and exactly observed the seventh day as the Sabbath, and were thus enabled to obey the Fourth Commandment from the standpoint of our exceedingly scrupulous brethren.

Yet, after all, if all these providential difficulties had been successfully surmounted, we are afraid there are some astronomical or chronological obstacles in the way which no human ingenuity could possibly have overcome.

With the imperfect knowledge of the motions of the heavenly bodies which men possessed in the ages before Christ, they could not, as might be expected, ascertain the precise measurement of the year; and in the course of several centuries after time had begun to be noted, the errors in their estimation of its duration had produced the loss of the notation of quite a number of days. Such loss was partly remedied and its recurrence sought to be guarded against by new arrangements of the days of the months, and by counting 365 1-4 days to the year, under Julius Cæsar; and the calendar so modified was called after him the Julian Calendar. But the error which still remained (for the year precisely calculated contains 365 days, 5 hours and some minutes, instead of 365 days, 6 hours), accumulating through the centuries, toward the close of the 16th century amounted to as many as ten days. The world had lived by so much longer, yet it was numbering itself ten days behind its age. Hence in 1582 Pope Gregory XIII. proclaimed that the 5th of October of that year should be dated as the 15th. But the Greek Church and the Protestant world disdained to heed a Popish command. Hence to this day Russia is eleven or more days behind our calendar. On the other hand, in 1752 Protestant England had sufficiently recovered from her antipathy to Rome to recognize that even a Pope might be correct in regard to astronomy and chronology, and thus the "Old Style" was rejected and the "New Style" of dating came into use; but the ten days had grown to eleven by that time. Hence, although we read that George Washington was born on the 11th of February, O. S., 1732, we celebrate his birthday on the 22d of that month to day.

Now, we ask, amid these changes, these losses of days and shiftings of dates to make up for them,—how could men have kept exact account of the precise seventh day that was to be hallowed as the Sabbath? Who will undertake to say that next Saturday is the seventh day, pointing back to an unbroken series of seventh days, reaching from itself back to that tremendous epoch in creation when God rested from all His works? Yet Saturday is of no account as a Sabbath day, unless this can be done. We must be able to fix unerringly upon the seventh day, else we cannot keep the Sabbath. If we start out to follow the words of the Fourth Commandment in a literal sense, we must be literally and altogether literal. And we are forced to this lamentable conclusion, (in view of the utter impossibility to ascertain the seventh day) If our seventh-day brethren are correct in their conviction, and the seventh is the essential and only day for the Sabbath, then we have lost the Sabbath forever! We may be thankful, therefore, that an intelligent and spiritual understanding of the Fourth Commandment does not necessitate a rigid attention to the killing letter.

The Ministry and the Labor Problem.

THE writer remembers listening at one time to an excellent sermon by the Rev. William Andrews, who is connected with the Apostolic Church, in which the point was conclusively taken, that the only remedy for the manifold social evils, from which it is very likely we are to have not a little trouble, the beginnings of which have already come, could be found in the Gospel of the Son of God. Since hearing that sermon, it has been frequently impressed upon my mind that not a little devolves upon the preacher, who, seeing the social difficulties of this present time, must be ready to faithfully apply this one and single remedy—the principles of the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

That preacher of the Word will be culpably negligent who fails to study some, if not all, of the problems which are progressing toward a final solution through strikes and riots. We realize the burden that is laid on us. When the questions that are involved in the complex relations of labor to capital are laid before us, and these questions are voiced in the cry of the workingman, there is only one course for the ministry to pursue. Once it was the opportunity of the Church to contend with the errors of Romanism, that the world might enjoy the very freedom of faith. To-day it is the question of honestly applying the teachings of God's Word to which all men can readily come. The minister cannot ignore the capitalist on the one hand; he must not ignore the laboring man on the other. To close his ear and shut his heart against the appeals which come from the lower avenues of industry, simply signifies the absence of the workingman from the sanctuary. At once there is created a difference which the most that the Protestant Church can do will never heal. The minister, above all men in the community, should study to understand what the demands of capital may be as against the grievances of labor. He cannot afford to wait until those extremes arise which an intelligent discussion might avoid. As Prof. Ely, in the Andover Review, is not indifferent to the very natural fact that the Romish Church appreciates the situation, we should not be slow to take the hint and place ourselves where a respectful hearing would be received on the part of capital and most profitable attention gained from those elements in the midst of us who will be safely led if their way to some desirable end be lightened by the Word of Him who "lighteth every man that cometh into the world."

Nor can the minister be faithful to this except he carefully listens to the claims of each party in the question. He must not only be found in the mansion of the capitalist, weighing the argument that is based on money and brains, but also in the humbler home of the workingman, without whose brawn and body capital would exist without any purpose but that of luxury and corruption. The writer, acting upon the suggestion of Dr. Ely, proposed to a fellow-clergyman that it might avail something to become a member of the Knights of Labor, but an after consideration led him to see that such a step would create a difference between the capitalist and himself, by reason of which a great vantage ground would be lost. Though he may not be a Knight of Labor, still he need not remove himself in his sympathies from the Knights, rather occupying the one position of the "preacher of righteousness," (nothing else is expected of him), declare against all wrongs and strive to bring about those more favorable conditions through which the laboring man will see that the capitalist is not the greatest enemy he has in this world.

It will not be thought of the minister of God's Word that he is stepping aside from his legitimate sphere when he goes to the aggrieved workingman to know the cause of his difficulty, when he subscribes for one of the many periodicals which represent the co-operative elements in this country, when he moves among the multitude for the sake of a better opportunity to understand the situation, nor indeed when an association of clergymen request the presence of a representative laboring man to hear from his own lips the story he has to tell. Indeed, unless the ministry are quick to perceive the important issues, and in such ways become both just and impartial, it is inevitable that the laboring man will lose all sympathy with the Church to which not a few are now looking; since their appeal is to the Word of God, while infidelity and materialism will be the harvest of it all.

Not very much may be expected of the secular press, since its influence does not ally any too closely with the cherished institutions of the Christian Church, but through the religious newspaper that finds its way to homes of workingmen a great deal may be accomplished, and while the pulpit may be heard of many, the paper will read as well, and through its agency the Christian minister may do much toward the sanctification of capital to its legitimate uses and the conversion of all men. Glances Across the Sea.

BY REV. HENRY E. DOSKER.

II.

THE struggle in the old mother church continues unabated. The eighty suspended members of the Consistory of Amsterdam are still in the ecclesiastical pillory and, according to latest information, all is in statu quo, with dangerous possibilities, however, of an eruption of the volcano, which may shake the fatherland in its church relations as it has never been shaken before.

All the while, however, things of a highly interesting nature have been occurring. Pamphlets fairly rain in every direction; Dr. Kuyper's own, "The Conflict Come," taking the lead by all odds, with its keen, thorough and interesting statement of the entire question. Remonstrances and contra-remonstrances are the order of the day. Party spirit runs high and many things are said and done, which will undoubtedly prove the cause of regret and shame in the near future.

The Classis of Amsterdam, mainly composed of Moderns and Ethical Trenians, with a thin sprinkling of Orthodox, has evidently overreached itself. In suspending the above eighty members of the Consistory of Amsterdam, it found its warrant (sic?) in Art. 3, Al. 2 of "the Regulations of Ecclesiastical Supervision and Discipline," which reads:

"Subject to discipline are all members and especially ministers, elders, deacons and other members of ecclesiastical judicatories, in case of unchristian-like behavior, of public conflict with the spirit and principles of the Confession of the Reformed Church, of disturbance of the order and peace and of neglect or misconduct in the exercise of ecclesiastical offices."

And also of Art. 48, according to which the suspension took immediate effect, which reads:

"If a 'fama clamosa' of an offensive character, which comes to the notice of Classis, is found to be founded in truth, the judicatory is warranted in provisionally suspending the accused at its preliminary investigation; and no appeal of the same shall be possible."

Now was there such a 'fama clamosa,' to which the above article might be applied, in the case of the eighty members of the Consistory of Amsterdam? Let me try to explain.

The main issue,—the giving of certificates to modern youths—which was strictly confessional, was lost sight of in a mere temporality. Amsterdam has ever had its own "beheer"—administration. It was its glory and pride. The Consistory elects a "Kerkvoogdy," a Board of Trustees, to whom the care of the congregational property is exclusively committed. The enemies feared that the orthodox, being largely in the majority in the Consistory, would come down with one fell swoop on all the possessions and that the other parties in Amsterdam would be absolutely beggared and ignominiously ousted.

Had they any ground for such dread? They thought so.

When the storm was brewing, the "Kerkvoogdy" had asked for instructions, whom they were to recognize as consistory, in case of the eventually possible suspension of some of its members. They were told to recognize those, whether suspended or not, who would obey and stand by the authority of the Word of God.

A bold step, but necessary, as later events plainly showed.

All those who voted for this resolution without any regard to their position in the case of the certificates above mentioned, were suspended, and no others.

This was the "fama clamosa." A bold, dreadful attempt, as the Classis held, at a wholesale, ecclesiastical robbery.

These eighty brethren once suspended, and the insurmountable orthodox majority in the Consistory broken, Classis proceeded,—"doende wat des Kerkeraads is"—assuming consistorial authority, at once to hand out the disputed certificates. No fewer than 300 modern youths were thus admitted to the full communion of the Church of Amsterdam.

But, in so doing, the Classis of Amsterdam lost its character as a Classis. It could not be accuser and judge, consistory and Classis, at the same time.

The Provincial Synod of North Holland took its place, therefore, as a Classis, and by the same novel process the General Synod was requested to assume Provincial authority.

But in order that the highest judicatory might not be dissolved by these telescoping proceedings, it was proposed that one half of said Synod only should sit as a Provincial Synod. The only warrant for all this was found in a proviso, since 1584 embodied in every Dutch "Kerkorde," namely, "that a Classis has authority to assume consistorial power, where no consistory exists, or where no fit persons could be found to form one.

Neither condition of affairs was true in Amsterdam.

Dr. Kuyper rightly remarked of all this, in his organ, that "in the entire set of regulations nowhere a single letter can be found whereby Synod ever or in any way is entitled to the right of such action."

Effective Evangelizing Agencies.

BY REV. E. B. COE, D.D.

SO long as the Gospel teaches the necessity of repentance and regeneration, of love to God and faith in Christ, so long as it deals with spiritual and not with material things, it will need to be patiently and persistently urged on the attention of those who are not eager to receive it. Even in communities like this, where churches are numerous and Christian believers are counted by thousands, where the gates of the kingdom of heaven stand open day and night, and whosoever will may enter them, the masses of the people can only be reach by those who go after them and press upon them the demands of God's law and the free offer of His love. How much more, then, must this be done in thinly settled and still unevangelized regions where there are few recognized centres of Christian influence, and in heathen lands where the message of the Gospel has only begun to be spoken. "Into the highways and the hedges," into the slums of great cities, into villages that are daily springing into existence, into scattered and destitute settlements and remote and solitary dwellings, the missionary must still go, uttering in every ear whose hearing he can win the message of eternal life.

It is a slow and laborious way to publish the Gospel to every creature, but it is the only way. The Church of Christ must face the fact as it is presented even in the communities where its influence is strongest. There are multitudes who will never come to it, and it must, therefore, go to them. It cannot bring them together to listen to its teaching, and it must, therefore, go and teach them one by one. Only thus is the evangelization of any great city possible, and only thus can the Gospel of Christ be thoroughly made known throughout the country. Churches may be multiplied till every family in the land has its separate pew, and the present necessity will hardly be diminished for faithful and devoted men who shall go from house to house, from room to room, everywhere declaring the unsearchable riches of Christ. He is not doing most for the advancement of God's kingdom in the world who preaches with the greatest power to the largest congregations, but he who with undaunted and unwearied soul goes up and down through city street or along steep and lonely mountain road, telling the story of Jesus Christ and Him crucified and persuading men one by one to begin a new life by becoming His disciples. So it was that Christianity conquered at first the Roman world, and so only it is that it will conquer the present and the future generations. No associated labor can ever supercede this patient, personal endeavor to carry the tidings of God's redeeming grace to every soul for which Christ died.

And yet how hopeless it seems! How hopeless, one may say, it would be but for one great instrumentality which in our times the Providence of God has placed in the hands of the minister of the Gospel, of the missionary, of every one who seeks to win others to Christ.

Everywhere the living preacher cannot go. There are regions inaccessible to him. There are doors that are closed against him. And even where he gains a hearing he cannot tarry. He must utter his message and pass on. But the printed Word goes everywhere. The Bible, the tract, the simple volume in which the essential truth of the Gospel is stated, illustrated, explained, pressed home upon the conscience and the heart—there are hardly any barriers which it cannot overleap, hardly any hands into which it may not fall. It speaks every language. It travels into every land. It remains when the missionary has gone his way. It awaits its time. It is always ready with its word of admonition or reproof or instruction or encouragement at the moment when that word is needed and is able to make its deepest impression. It is passed from hand to hand and thus bears fruit, sometimes a hundred-fold. It provokes no hot opposition and makes no angry or foolish reply; but it calmly repeats its solemn and tender message as often as the eye falls on its unchanging, appealing page.

A single man with a printing-press at his command is a society in himself. And the power of those who have at heart the promotion of any cause whatever is incalculably augmented by this amazing instrumentality. It is no wonder that the Church, if it did not invent it, was the first to make use of it. And the Protestant Reformation largely owed its success to the aid of the new art which it brought into its service. It is needless to remind you of that which we all owe to the religious literature existing in such abundance around us. The point which I urge is that without the aid of this great means of preaching the Gospel to those who are ignorant of it the work of evangelizing the world would appear almost hopeless. We might well despair of reaching with the living voice the myriads who are perishing in darkness and sin. But by the printed page the power of every laborer for Christ is indefinitely multiplied. "The little one becomes a thousand," and the seed scattered in weakness by the hand of a child may spring up into a mighty harvest, gladdening both earth and heaven.—From the Annual Sermon before the American Tract Society, N. Y., May 16th, 1886, as published in the Christian Weekly.

The Reading Room.

Our Book-Shelves.

....SUMMER READING in great variety, clearly printed and bound in strong and flexible paper covers, is furnished in weekly installments by a dozen of our publishers of the best repute.

Every week brings a new number of the convenient little books of Harper's Handy Series. The last addition, No. 78, is "Army Society," a discursive story by J. S. Winter, who made a decided impression with "Mignon; or, Bootles' Baby." His "Cavalry Life," a volume of sketches, has also a place in the series. But these later publications have not the grace, tenderness, and refined humor of Mignon. "With the King at Oxford," by Rev. Alfred J. Church, No. 66, is a superior historical novel, reproducing the time of the Great Rebellion in Britain. "Irish History for English Readers," No. 62, by W. S. Gregg, gives facts not agreeable to many Englishmen, and deserves to be read just now, when Irish affairs demand so much attention. "The Choice of Books," by Frederic Harrison, No. 69, is one of the works much talked about at present. A number of essays on a variety of subjects are within the same covers, all suggestive, thoughtful, instructive and charmingly written. Miss Edgeworth's "The Absentee," an old favorite, an English classic, a graphic picture of the evils, the joys and the sorrows of Irish landlordism, with touches of Irish wit, occupies No. 73. Dr. Richard T. Ely prepared for English readers a judicious and sensible account of "French and German Socialism," and this appears as No. 75. There are also novels by popular English authors, among them, "Our Sensation Novel," by Justin H. McCarthy, a capital specimen of sensational writing; "The Head Station," by Mrs. Campbell-Praed, a story of Australian life, certified to be a correct representation of life in Australia by competent judges; and "King Arthur. Not a Love Story," by Miss Mulock, are especially admired. But, after reading the last, we thought, "Not a Love Story! How could you fib so, Miss Mulock?" It is a delightful love story, told with great delicacy.

Having said so much about the Handy Series, space is not at command to-day to say of Harper's Franklin Square Library more than that a similar variety of solid yet entertaining and of light reading is to be found in the numbers, which have now risen to 529 and form a library indeed.

So far books of to-day have occupied our pen, but if any one wishes books which have come safely through the ordeal of many years of criticism, he will find them in Cassell's National Library, edited by Professor Henry Morley, which means a great deal, for very few men are as well qualified for such a work as this editor. Here will be found such books as: "The Voyages and Travels of Sir John Maundeville, Kt.," the most popular book of travels in the 14th century and abounding in wonderful marvels and miracles; "She Stoops to Conquer" and "The Good Natured Man," by Goldsmith, with an introduction by Prof. Morley worth much more than the cost of the book; "The Adventures of Baron Trenck," occupying two numbers, giving the story of one who suffered from the arbitrary decrees of Frederick the Great, much of the punishment, as we judge, being deserved; "The Lady of the Lake," by Sir Walter Scott; selections by editor Morley from "Martin Luther's Table-Talk;" Sheridan's two noted comedies of "The Rivals" and "The School for Scandal;" Bishop Latimer's "Sermons on the Card" and "On the Plough," quaint, forcible and impressive; Horace Walpole's ridiculous, melodramatic ghost story of "The Castle of Otranto," but a delightful piece of writing for all that; Plutarch's unrivalled "Lives of Alexander the Great" and of "Julius Cæsar;" "The Man of Feeling," by Mackensie, the tears being bottled by the editor in the appendix; Macaulay's scathing essay on "Lord Bacon;" three of Dr. Johnson's famous "Lives of the Poets," and Edmund Burke's eloquent and philosophical "Thoughts on the Present Discontents, and Speeches." There are 19 numbers in all, each one small enough to be carried with comfort in a breast pocket, each legibly printed, and each to be had for the almost insignificant outlay of ten cents.

Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons continue the series of their novels in covers of yellow paper, the last being "The Mark of Cain," by Andrew Lang, which just misses the standard of a strong story. The separate scenes are carefully and sometimes brilliantly wrought out, but the development goes on so rapidly as to leave an impression of "jerkiness." But the story bears the mark of a powerful writer.

The Riverside Paper Series of Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., for this season will consist of thirteen numbers. The first is "Burglars in Paradise," by Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, a continuation of the old maid's Paradise of last year, and characterized by the same accurate delineation of character, delicate and incisive humor, and natural blending of humor and pathos. There is keen criticism of the pretensions and dishonesty of detective agencies and of the incapacity of men in various positions of responsibility. A story nearly every one will hold on to until the last word is read. We rather longed for a more explicit record of the fate of the last burglar.

Messrs. Macmillan & Co. have also begun a Summer Reading Series, with "Mr. Isaacs," by F. Marion Crawford, an orignal and decidedly powerful story, which won the author a world-wide reputation and which many think has not been equalled by any of his subsequent compositions.

....JOSEPH, THE PRIME MINISTER." By W. M. Taylor, D D., LL.D. A daily evening paper says of this work, "The majority of the didactic reflections contained in the books are simply platitudes. The history of Joseph is infinitely more touching and interesting than anything Dr. Taylor says about it." The latter of these remarks is true, and would be true of any expositor or preacher, be he who he may. But the former is a great error. There is scarce a single platitude in the book. Explanations of words and customs are given wherever needed, and are drawn from the latest and best sources. The lessons drawn from the narrative are not indeed new, for how could they be on a field so often trodden? But they are given with a freshness, vivacity and point which make them interesting and profitable to any reader. The old truths are passed through the alembic of Dr. Taylor s searching and analytic intellect, and they come out with a graphic force and incisiveness which make one wonder at the arrogance that could stigmatize them as commonplace. The volume will add to the author's well-earned reputation as a skilful expounder of the meaning and the applications of the Scripture narratives. (Harpers.)

...."IN AID OF FAITH." By Lyman Abbott. This volume hardly corresponds to its name. It is no aid to faith to minimize the objects of faith or to weaken the integrity of doctrinal truth. Yet this is what these pages do. The "testimony of consciousness" is made to include the devotee of the Virgin and even the worshipper of Buddha (p. 50), the atonement is resolved into the law of sacrifice, justification is con founded with sanctification, and the resurrection of the body is stated to be a dream and a delusion. As to retribution, Dr. Abbott is like and yet unlike to Archdeacon Farrar. The latter, after loading the doctrine of endless punishment with every vituperative term his florid rhetoric could suggest, yet was compelled to say that he did not absolutely deny it, because it might be true. The former admits that the hopeless doom of the incorrigible sinner is as clearly taught by Christ as words can teach it (p. 172), yet he says that the more he studies the Bible the more unscriptural seems the conception of endless sin (p. 173). It seems to us that a man had better adjust and settle his own views of Biblical teaching before he undertakes to help or guide others. (E. P. Dutton & Co.)

...."WITNESS MY HAND." For light reading this story of English life and love will please many. It is told in a plain, easy style, and the plot is just enough to interest the reader without distracting his mind. It concludes in the happy manner of the older period, when the true heart always obtained the prize and the "villain" was baffled and overthrown. In this case the plotter is a lady committing the crime of forgery, but she comes to grief as she should. (Cassell & Co.)

... A most appropriate book to put into the hands of children who are to pass the summer in the country is called, "AMONG THE TREES AT ELMRIDGE," by Ella Rodman Church. The author, who is an accomplished writer for young people, has collected a great deal of information in regard to the history and habits of trees and pleasantly connected this by a thread of narrative. The maple, elm, oak, ash, olive, birch, and a large number of other trees are thus made to teach useful lessons, while they lead those who study them to "look from Nature up to Nature's God." The book is abundantly and fitly illustrated. (Presbyterian Board of Publication.)

Our Library Table.

Periodicals, Serials and Notes.

....The making of a book of unusual artistic merit and attractiveness is progressing in The English Illustrated Magazine, in the drawings of Hugh Thomson, illustrating selections from Addison and Steele's "Spectator." The June number supplies also more about Yarmouth and the Broads in an article very agreeably written as a matter of course, for it is by Mr. Joseph Hatton, and is illustrated by Helen H. Hatton. The second part of Umbria, in which Assisi is described by Katharine S. Macquoid and illustrated by Thomas Macquoid, will be enjoyed by those who have a very pleasant recollection of the first part. A Girl of Morocco, the frontispiece, from a drawing by G. L. Seymour, is lifelike and is engraved with superior skill.

....In the Magazine of American History for June the struggle ending in the Fall of the Alamo and the massacre of its garrison, is vividly described by G. Norton Galloway. The paper is handsomely illustrated. A portrait of Jefferson Davis, facing the first page, will be prized by some Southern readers. Other valuable articles are Canada's Actual Condition by Dr. Prosper Bender, Self-Government by Hon. George Bancroft, The Reconstruction of History by the Rev. Geo. E. Ellis, D.D., The Convention of Virginia, in 1788, by A. W. Clason. The War papers are Battles of Port Republic and Lewiston, by Alfred E. Lee; Retreat of the Confederate Government, by W. H. Swallow, and an amusing account of the parole of Gen. Mosby, the Last of the Confederates, by W. G. Waller. The number is a fit conclusion of the Fifteenth Volume, a volume, as we believe, never before equalled by an American historical periodical, and one of permanent value.

....The American, of Philadelphia, from which extracts are frequently printed in these columns, is a decidedly Republican weekly journal and one of the most mighty of the advocates of Protection in this country. We say this at the outset that no one may be misled. The paper is a political one, but of the highest character. But it also treats such themes as the relations of capital and labor, the condition of Ireland and what Ireland needs, the Indian problem, the German scheme of colonization, educational systems, and other topics of the times with unusual intelligence and ability. Many of the articles are written by specialists and abound in information. The journal is also one of the most conscientious and fearless literary papers of the country, and the reviews are written by persons especially qualified for the work they undertake. The American is published at 921 Arch street, Philadelphia, at $3 a year.

....Wide Awake for June is brilliant, versatile and instructive. It is suited to the mental wants of the young and the mature. Its rhymes and stories and parables will draw as blossoms draw the bees, and its pages throughout have the breath and the fragrance of June. It requires a vast deal of study, wit and labor to provide a magazine like this, with a feast that does not pall from monotony or weary from excess of spicery. The illustrations are good, but not perfect.

....Everyone knows that each number of St. Nicholas contains the material for a month of happiness. Through it the best writers and artists contribute to the entertainment and profit of the young people. In the June issue J. T. Trowbridge begins a serial story entitled "The Help-Gatherers," and Frank R. Stockton has a richly illustrated paper on "Queen Paris." The frontispiece, "A June Morning," is a marvel of beauty. The children who are not reading Mrs. Burnett's "Little Lord Fauntleroy" miss a rare treat.

THE American Home Missionary Society met in Saratoga last week. Chief interest centered on Secretary Clark's report. The following summary of statistics is given:

"Measured by a few significant figures and briefly told, the summary is as follows: In men, 1,447, a gain of 22; in fields occupied, 3,005, a gain of 12; in years of labor performed, 1,058, a gain of 41; in churches organized, 152; in new Sunday-schools gathered, 296; in Sunday-school scholars, 120,000; in additions to the churches, 9,050; in converts reported, 7,115, a gain of 2,000; in church buildings completed, 145; and in churches brought to self-support, 66, a gain over the previous year of 16. The total cash receipts of the treasury for the sixtieth year, including our auxiliaries, is $524,544.93. This is the largest amount ever reported, and a gain of nearly $73,000 over the receipts of the previous year. The gain has been chiefly in legacies. The Swett bequest has twice saved our treasury from bankruptcy."

....The Baptist Societies met at Asbury Park, N. J., on May 25th. The Missionary Union (Foreign) reported 45 stations and 957 outstations, 221 missionaries, 1,731 native preachers, 1,220 churches, 118,163 members, of whom 8,970 were received in 1885. Receipts $384,996.73, expenditures $382,000, of which $50,615 was to pay debt. ....The Home Mission Society reported receipts $382,314, and payments $337,038, balance paid on debt, which still remained about $80,000 on April 1st. Missionaries employed 522, and and about 100 teachers; members added last year by confession 3,296. Warm debate on announcement that the Building Fund had lost about $115,000 by failure of John H. Deane, Attorney and Trustee.

....The Southern Presbyterian General Assembly met last month in Augusta, Ga. The Committee on Foreign Missions reported receipts $73,170, outlay about $69,000; missionaries 54, native helpers, 45, stations 25, outstations 103, communicants 1,616—237 added during the year, pupils in day-schools 626; missions in China, Japan, Mexico, Brazil, Italy, Greece, and the Indian Territory....Committee on Home Missions announced income $59,599, of which $27,509 for sustentation or salaries of pastors, for Evangelistic Fund $19,043, for Invalid Fund $10,797, for Colored Evangelistic Fund $462. Fifty-nine evangelists were employed in 38 Presbyteries, and aid in pastoral support given to over 400 weak churches ...Committee on Publication had paid $8,350 of bonded debt, had assets $54,886 in excess of liabilities, and sales for the year $23,552, and had received $6,861 by contributions.

....Home Missionary Board of Presbyterian Church, North, reported to General Assembly, income of $671,628, of which $139,708 was used to pay off the debt; 1,367 missionaries employed, and 89 schools maintained.

The English and the Irish.

IN 1851, the Rev. Henry M. Field, D.D., the present editor of The Evangelist, published "The Irish Confederates," which is quoted from by the papers. As explaining the hostility between the Irish and English we select these passages:

The most woeful blunder ever committed in the long misgovernment of Ireland, was the laws early passed prohibiting marriages between the English and the native Irish—even making it an act of high treason. This rendered the evil incurable. The two races, naturally jealous of each other, were thus forced asunder. The nation was divided into a dominant and a servile class, between whom there must be forever jealousy, hatred, and often civil war.

Had the Normans, at the period of their conquest, prohibited marriages with the Saxons, the same bitterness would have been entailed upon England. The two races would never have coalesced. The animosity of slaves to their masters would have descended from generation to generation. The history of England would have been little more than a succession of wars between two races as utterly apart and as deadly hostile as the Spaniard and the Moor. Had the same barbarous laws been passed in Wales and Scotland to render impossible a mixture of the subjugated people with their masters, the English would have been as cordially detested in those countries to this day as they are in Ireland.

Elizabeth proposed the complete subjugation of Ireland. The policy adopted was as unsparing and relentless as that of Cortez in Mexico. But the Briton found in the Celt a haughtier foe than the Spaniard found in the Mexican. The Irish were often vanquished in battle, but never subdued. It was then proposed to exterminate the people by laying waste the country. Burning and massacre devastated the land. The flames, set to fields of waving grain, consumed the food of the people. Famine completed the havoc which war had begun. Then ensued a scene of woe only equalled by the ravages of Hyder Ali in the Carnatic. "No spectacle," says Morrison, "was more frequent in the ditches of towns, and especially in wasted counties, than to see multitudes of these poor people dead, with their mouths all colored green by eating nettles, docks, and all things they could rend up above ground."

. . . . . .

Cromwell came to Ireland apparently with the feeling that the country had never been conquered, and determined to finish the work. He attacked Drogheda, which after an obstinate defense, surrendered on promise of quarter. The bravery with which the town was defended would have led a generous foe to grant honorable terms. But Cromwell refused to ratify the agreement of his officers, by which their lives were to be spared. He ordered the whole garrison to be put to the sword. It consisted of two thousand men, and the butchery occupied two days. It was the design of this massacre to strike terror into the hearts of the Irish. Perhaps, to some extent, it succeeded. But it fixed the first indelible stain on the name of Oliver Cromwell. The same horrors were repeated at Wexford. Cromwell forbade his soldiers to give quarter.

AUNT MARJORIE'S CORNER.

Woman's Work.

"The wife and mother has to conduct at the same time a university, a clothing establishment, a restaurant, a laundry, a library, while she is health officer, police, and president of her realm! She must do a thousand things, and do them well, in order to keep things going smoothly; and so her brain and her nerves are taxed to the utmost. I know there are housekeepers who are so fortunate that they can sit in an arm-chair in the library, or lie on the belated pillow, and throw off all the care upon subordinates, who, having large wages and great experience, can attend to all of the affairs of the household. Those are the exception. I am speaking this morning of the great mass of housekeepers—the women to whom life is a struggle, and who at thirty years of age look as though they were forty, and at forty look as though they were fifty, and at fifty look as though they were sixty. The fallen at Chalons, and Austerlitz, and Gettysburg, and Waterloo are a small number compared with the slain in the great Armageddon of the kitchen. You go out to the cemetery, and you will see that the tombstones all read beautifully poetic; but if those tombstones would speak the truth, thousands of them would say: 'Here lies a woman killed by too much mending, and sewing, and baking, and scrubbing, and scouring; the weapon with which she was slain was a broom, or a sewing-machine, or a ladle.' You think, O man of the world! that you have all the cares and anxieties. If the cares and anxieties of the household should come upon you for one week, you would be a fit candidate for Bloomingdale Insane Asylum. The half-rested housekeeper arises in the morning. She must have the morning repast prepared at an irrevocable hour. What if the fire will not light; what if the marketing did not come; what if the clock has stopped—no matter, she must have the morning repast at an irrevocable hour. Then the children must be got off to school. What if their garments are torn; what if they do not know their lessons; what if they have lost a hat or sash—they must be ready. Then you have all the diet of the day, and perhaps of several days, to plan; but what if the butcher has sent meat unmasticable, or the grocer has sent articles of food adulterated, and what if some piece of silver be gone, or some favorite chalice be cracked, or the roof leak, or the plumbing fail, or any one of a thousand things occur—you must be ready. Spring weather comes, and there must be a revolution in the family wardrobe; or autumn comes, and you must shut out the northern blast; but what if the moth has preceded you to the chest; what if, during the year, the children have outgrown the apparel of last year; what if the fashions have changed. Your house must be an apothecary's shop; it must be a dispensary; there must be medicines for all sorts of ailments—something to loosen the croup, something to cool the burn, something to poultice the inflammation, something to silence the jumping tooth, something to soothe the earache. You must be in half a dozen places at the same time, or you must attempt to be. If, under all this wear and tear of life, Martha makes an impatient rush upon the library or drawing-room, be patient, be lenient! O woman, though I may fail to stir up an appreciation in the souls of others in regard to your household toils, let me assure you, from the kindliness with which Jesus Christ met Martha, that He appreciates all your work from garret to cellar; and that the God of Deborah, and Hannah, and Abigail, and Grandmother Lois, and Elizabeth Fry, and Hannah More is the God of the housekeeper!

"There is nothing but the old-fashioned religion of Jesus Christ that will take a woman happily through the trials of home life. At first there may be a romance or a novelty that will do for a substitute. The marriage hour has just passed, and the perplexities of the household are more than atoned by the joy of being together, and by the fact that when it is late they do not have to discuss the question as to whether it is time to go! The mishaps of the household, instead of being a matter of anxiety and reprehension, are a matter of merriment—the loaf of bread turned into a geological specimen; the slushy custards; the jaundiced or measly biscuits. It is a very bright delight that falls on the cutlery and the mantel ornaments of a new home.

"But after a while the romance is all gone, and then there is something to be prepared for the table that the book called 'Cookery Taught in Twelve Lessons' will not teach. The receipt for making it is not a handful of this, a cup of that, and a spoonful of something else. It is not something sweetened with ordinary condiments, or flavored with ordinary flavors, or baked in ordinary ovens. It is the loaf of domestic happiness; and all the ingredients come down from heaven, and the fruits are plucked from the tree of life, and it is sweetened with the new wine of the kingdom, and it is baked in the oven of home trial. Solomon wrote out of his own experience. He had a wretched home. A man cannot be happy with two wives, much less six hundred; and he says, writing out of his own experience: 'Better is a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox and hatred therewith.'"

Housekeeping, Babies and Servants.

"SHE has degenerated sadly," said a man, regretfully, of a married woman of five or six years' standing. "Before her marriage she was fond of study and reading, but now she can think and talk of nothing but housekeeping, babies and servants!"

A poet—a woman, by the way,—gives a young girl's criticism of married life as being all very well at first, but that when the babies begin to come dust gathers on the piano and the books and a woman settles down into a household drudge.

It a common fault with conscientious women to esteem too lightly the material part of their duties. While the truth is admitted that it is an exceptional man who will enjoy a discussion of poetry or philosophy with his wife while his buttons are neglected and his dinners ill-cooked, yet it is also true that the wise old words, "Man shall not live by bread alone," apply to things intellectual as well as to physical and spiritual nourishment. A man's body may be well fed, clothed and housed by his wife's constant and efficient toil, while his mind goes stinted and hungry for the food that it is just as much her obligation to provide for him. Many women learn this when it is too late, when the knowledge comes to them with the sharp accompanying pang that it is no longer in their power to be mental as well as material helpmeets. If the blunder were caused by willful blindness it might excite less compassion. But the majority of wives have meant well, only lacking keenness of perception to divine what is the cause of the narrowing and belittling of sympathies that once used to be broad and deep.

The saying is not infrequently heard, "She has grown so domestic since her marriage that she seems to care for nothing outside of her house." Dr. Johnson's celebrated query "whether or not knowledge of Latin was compatible with the delicacy of the female sex?" has been triumphantly answered, and the time has gone by when a woman was supposed to lose her feminine charm in proportion as she entered intelligently into her husband's business pursuits. The antiquated idea that a man preferred a woman who was a pretty fool, a doll to amuse him in his leisure hours, is rapidly losing ground. Some men may yet be found among those whom the world esteems sensible, who do not hesitate to declare that it does not lie in a woman's power to be an intellectual companion for her husband—that it is useless for him to expect this impossibility or for her to attempt it. The long list of those wives who by their unbounded faith, their unvarying sympathy, and their constant stimulus to ambition and effort have made their husbands gives the lie to this statement.

That it requires no more energy on a woman's part to hold her standard high than it does for a man may be questioned. Women lack not only the constant contact with the outer world, the friction of mind upon mind that a man experiences in his daily life, but they are handicapped by physical ailments and infirmities from which a man is blessedly exempt. Small as the items of his labor may seem, they can hardly be as petty in their details as those that compose the round of her daily life. The devices of how to use up the scraps, the endeavor to recollect that soap and candles are needed, the struggles to reduce the expenditures of butter and sugar to reasonable limits, the settling of little jars between children and servants, the planning to get silver polished, windows washed and parlor swept without letting any one of them become disreputably dirty, and yet to avoid crowding too much cleaning into one week—all these, and a thousand other tiny cares that will rush to any housekeeper's mind must be better calculated to contract the mental horizon than any branch of trade or professional occupation.

Then, too, the conversation of sensible men is generally wider and more varied in compass than that of sensible women. Politics, even local politics, must be a little more elevating than "housekeeping, babies and servants,"—certainly more so than are these when the elements of gossip and scandal are introduced. A man can hardly hold his part in a political discussion in a village store without a smattering of information on the tariff, the monetary system of the country, unlimited immigration, the history and comparative merits of Democrats, Republicans and mugwumps. One-sided as his opinions may be, he nevertheless possesses them. With a woman the case is different. No one talks politics with her. She knows the silver dollars are a nuisance, but she has very misty notions as to why they happen to be so much more plentiful than the paper notes; nor is she much clearer upon free trade, the Chinese question and the operations of Congress and the Senate. She is not altogether to blame in this. It is the man's duty to the wife who devotes herself to his comfort to be no less diligent in his efforts to prepare mental nutriment for her. The fact remains that many women decline to receive it, and even the most patient of husbands wearies of the fruitless toil of striving to interest his wife in these questions, whether of politics, business or literature, which attract him. He either seeks companionship elsewhere, or—perhaps a sadder alternative—resigns his early desires for higher things and settles into a money making machine.

If a woman owes it to her husband to keep the weapons in her mental armory bright and keen, the obligation is no less binding upon her for the sake of her children. A child's respect can be compelled up to a certain age; after that it must be earned. It is a terrible shock to juvenile faith when a child once realizes that the father and mother are not omniscient. The discovery must come sooner or later, but if possible it should be deferred until the reasoning powers are sufficiently well established for the little one to understand that dearth of information upon some one point does not entail ignorance upon all subjects. In the desire to avoid this difficulty the other one of feigning knowledge is to be equally shunned. Children have astonishingly quick perceptions, and if they once ascertain that they have been deceived or intentionally misinformed their faith is gone forever. Far preferable is it for a parent to say candidly: "I do not know, but I will try to find out for you." Where there is no pretension there can be no lack of respect.

The idiotically self conceited period comes to nearly every child sooner or later, when he thinks he knows more than he can be taught by either father or mother, and regards their stores of facts and accomplishments with patronizing contempt. This stage is less likely to arrive or more apt to be speedily and safely passed if parents are known to be constantly increasing their own stock of learning.

The pursuance of a regular system of reading is more easily preached to than practised by busy women. There is no small army of those who declare that they have not an hour in the day they can call their own. But even with ten minutes per diem something may be achieved. A book kept on hand for odd moments may be finished in time and the habit of reading once rooted is a strong point gained. As children grow older a great deal may be accomplished by the practice of reading aloud. When this is begun by little children the system is not apt to be dropped as they grow older. By judicious care the mother may make herself the intellectual centre of the family. It will require large patience and boundless sympathy to enter into a half-grown girl's transports over namby-pamby verse, but by these and by the curbing of sarcastic comment upon crudeness of taste and sentimentality of disposition, the girl may be won to a love for something better and stronger.

In the case of boys, too, the mother who has kept pace with their reading may do much toward diverting them from the appetite for the "penny dreadful" story and the Jesse James Western tales to a taste far more healthful; books of adventure, for the experiences and deeds of manly men and true heroes. Had this been the course of more mothers our papers would not be filled with accounts of gangs of boy desperadoes, of youthful runaways, and child criminals. At first, care in these particulars may seem less essential than attention to bodily needs, although while the one should be done the other ought not to be left undone. The mother has her reward for her struggles not only in the improvement of her children and in the appreciation of her efforts, but in the benefit she herself derives from the mental and moral discipline. Her own taste is cultured, her own tone elevated, and she learns the truth in more ways than one of the quaint old rhyme—

"Little things
On little wings
Bear little souls to heaven."

CHILDREN'S PORTFOLIO.

The Story of a Hard Fight.

"WHAT can those two boys be talking about?" said Mrs. Upton to her husband one morning. "They look as wise and mysterious as though they were eighty years old instead of seven and eight. I hope they're not planning any mischief." With this the good lady sighed.

Indeed, she too often had cause to sigh over her two frolicsome lads. They did not mean to be trouble some or disobedient, but somehow they had a way of making plans which often brought annoyance to their mother and disgrace upon themselves. This time, however, they were not plotting mischief. They were simply considering how they might help in the work of a Mission Band which they had joined the day before. This Band had pledged itself to the support of a little boy in a school in India, and each member had promised to give something from his own earnings or savings for this purpose. Let us listen a moment to the two brothers as they whisper together in the corner.

"We can't give anything from our savings," says Henry, the elder, "for we have nothing to save. But I'll tell you what, Charley, I've a plan for making something."

"What is it?" asks Charley, while his eyes sparkle.

"Well, you know that nice-looking old gentleman who has just moved next door. I saw him yesterday out looking in the fields for greens, but it was terribly hard work for him to stoop over. I guess he has the rheumatism or something. He asked me if I knew what yellow-dock is, and I showed him some. Now, suppose we should go there this morning with a basketful. Don't you think he'd buy it of us?"

"In course he would," answered Charley, "'specially if we should tell him what the money is for."

So the plan was made and carried out most successfully. Children who live in the country do not need a description of the slender-leaved weed called dock, which grows so abundantly in our fields, and is by many prized as an article of food. The two boys filled a good-sized basket with this spring delicacy and offered it to their new neighbor, who not only promptly bought it for the sum of five cents, but ordered a supply for every morning for a month.

"Whew!" exclaimed Charley, as they were scampering home to report their good success. "How he must like greens! But never mind. It's a good thing for us. Isn't it, old fellow?"

"To be sure it is, to be sure. Why! we'll make enough to buy that little boy's clothes, I should think, for a year. I wish I knew enough 'rithmetic to count up how much it will come to. Let's ask Bill when he comes in at noon."

Bill, the "hired man," when applied to, dutifully set about the calculation. He reckoned thirty days to the month and announced that the sum would be exactly and precisely one dollar and a half. "And that's a good deal," he added, "for little 'uns like you to make."

"But you haven't taken out the Sundays," said Charley. "Of course, we can't work on Sundays."

"Of course not;" said Henry, "that would be what mother calls 'doing evil that good may come,' and maybe she won't let us work when it rains."

"Well, never mind. If you stick to your bargain every day when you can, you'll be able to do your part, and I'll count up your money when you get it all together." This from Bill, who was the boys' oracle. You may look up that word in the dictionary, if you do not quite understand what it means.

The boys did stick to their bargain. One five-cent piece after another found its way into the little box set apart for the treasured earnings. There were but two very rainy days that month. Making allowance for these and the four Sundays there must have been, how much in the box?

"A dollar and twenty cents," somebody answers, and that somebody agrees with Bill, who slowly and carefully reached the same result.

"What a pity it hadn't been five cents more!" he exclaimed. "That would have been ten shillings. Guess I'll have to give you that to make the thing even."

Dear me! How guilty Charley looked then. What could have been the matter? I will have to tell you.

It had happened that that very morning he had gone alone to carry the last basketful of greens, and that the old gentleman who had proved such a good customer, had rewarded him with ten cents instead of five. Poor Charley! The temptation had been too much for him. He had put half of the money into his pocket and the other half into the box. Nobody would be the wiser, he thought, and he did so want to be able to buy some torpedoes for the coming Fourth of July.

Yet there were two who knew of his dishonesty. He knew of it himself, and the knowledge made him unhappy. The Lord above knew of it, for no one can escape from His all-seeing eye. All day long Charley suffered from the reproaches of his conscience. He had deceived Henry, he had deceived Bill, and he meant to deceive the other members of the Mission Band, for Henry, of course, would tell them that they had put all their earnings into the box. He had a hard fight for some hours, but conscience won in the end.

After supper he went up to Bill, who was sitting outside of the kitchen door, and handed him the five cents which he could no longer keep in his pocket.

"Here, Bill," said he, "I'll pay you back this money. I ought to have put it into the box, but I didn't."

Then he stammered out the story of his temptation. Bill was surprised, of course, and so was Henry, who was standing near.

"You've done well," said honest Bill; "you've done well to bring back the money, for it really wasn't yours after you'd promised to give it away, and if you'd kept it you'd have been acting, to my thinking, very much like Ananias and Sapphira that your pa read about at family prayers this morning. Now we'll just put it into the box along with the rest, and there'll be so much more for your boy in India."

Charley went to bed happy, feeling that he had done right, though it cost him a struggle to do so. Since he did not keep the five cents, I hope he will have some torpedoes for the Fourth of July.

A Childish Lesson.

FRANKY is almost five years old,
Wise as a serpent, and twice as sly!
A bright little monkey, merry and bold,
Mischief and mirth in his twinkling eye.

Temper at times can gleam there, too!
But whenever he screams in a baby rage—
Stamping and striking, as children do—
He grieves with a sorrow beyond his age.

The little fellow has learned to say—
Folding his hands as he kneels on the floor,
"Franky's a naughty boy to-day,
But he never must do so any more!"

Franky's papa, one evening, sat
Talking of matters with Uncle John;
They spoke of the chances of this and that,
And the terrible way that things went on;

And words ran high and higher yet,
Till Franky's papa, with might and main,
Brought down his hand on the table, set,
While the glass and china rang again.

Franky folded his fingers tight;
Suddenly lisped, as he knelt on the floor,
"Papa's a naughty boy to-night,
But he never must do so any more!"

Oh! little Franky, you hardly knew,
As you joined in the laugh where each one smiled,
The wholesome lesson your elders drew
From the lisping lips of a roguish child!

A Mother's Influence.

IN a railway car a man about sixty years old came to sit beside me. He had heard me lecture the evening before on temperance. "I am master of a ship," said he, "sailing out of New York, and have just returned from my fifteenth voyage across the Atlantic. About thirty years ago I was a sot, shipped while dead drunk, and was carried on board like a log. When I came to, the captain asked me, 'Do you remember your mother?' I told him she died before I could remember. 'Well,' said he, 'I am a Vermont man. When I was young I was crazy to go to sea. At last my mother consented I should seek my fortune. "My boy," she said, "I don't know anything about towns, and I never saw the sea, but they tell me they make thousands of drunkards. Now promise me you'll never drink a drop of liquor."' He said: 'I laid my hands in hers and promised, as I looked into her eyes for the last time. She died soon after. I've been on every sea, seen the worst kind of life and men—they laughed at me as a milksop, and wanted to know if I was a coward. But when they offered me liquor, I saw my mother's pleading face, and I never drank a drop. It has been my sheet anchor; I owe it all to that. Would you like to take that pledge?' said he." My companion took it, and he added, "It has saved me. I have a fine ship, wife and children at home, and I have helped others."

That earnest mother saved two men to virtue and usefulness; how many more, He who sees all can alone tell.—Wendell Phillips.

Sponges.

THE common sponge of our bath-rooms is not a very highly developed member of the great fish family, and sponge-fishing has not half the fascination of trouting. The Governor of the Bahama Islands, writing to the Fortnightly Review, gives a clear and interesting account of sponging in his domain: "From October until July the sponging season is in full swing. There are over five thousand men and boys engaged in the fishery, each schooner carrying a crew of from five to seven. The sponges are found all over the banks, which vary in depth from two to four fathoms.

"Arrived on the ground, the small boats, of which each schooner carries two or three, put off, manned each by two men, one of whom sculls while the other, armed with a thirty-foot pole bearing at the end a double hook, lies extended over the bow and examines the bottom through a 'sponge-glass,' or bucket with a glass bottom.

"Laying this upon the surface, everything below is seen as clearly as if no water intervened. Even in fifteen and twenty fathoms the bottom can be clearly seen.

"The sponges when found are hooked up by the armed pole, and as soon as the schooner's deck is filled she sails away to a 'ranche,' where she deposits her now evil-smelling load in a 'crawl,' or inclosure of wattles in shallow water, where it remains for a fortnight, during which the crew are fishing for a fresh cargo.

"On their return, all hands enter the crawl and beat out the now rotted fleshy part of the sponge, which, when first gathered, presents the appearance of a round mass of dark India rubber, freely perforated.

"When the fleshy part has been thoroughly removed and the marketable skeleton washed, the heap is laid on shore in a secluded spot, while the lot that has taken its place remains in the crawl, and the schooner starts again for the sponge banks. At length enough has been gathered and cleaned to load the vessel, when the sponges are sorted by the crew into glove, reef, lamb's wool, grass, etc., and each kind separately strung in rings of from one to two dozen.

"In this way they are sold by auction in the sponge exchange, when the first step of the preparation for the consumer is carried out by the sponge merchants. The sponges are exposed to the sun to improve the color. They are then clipped and all irregularities and pieces of shell or rock removed by the clipper, and once out of his hands, they are, so far as the Bahama sponge merchant is concerned, ready to be pressed into bales and exported."

A Declaration of Faith.

THE following "Revised Edition" of the "Declaration of Faith" prepared by the Committee of the Congregational Church, is kindly sent to us from the Congregational House, Boston. The most important suggested changes are in italics. This revision is not the work of the Committee. Who has made it we do not know. It comes to us from a source worthy of respect. Is this the short creed which some Christians consider desirable and which they believe would prove useful?

I. We believe in one God, infinite in all perfections, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit;

In the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible:

In the Only-Begotten Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord, who is of one substance with the Father; by whom all things were made, and continue to exist:

In the Holy Spirit, the Giver of life, who is sent from the Father and the Son, and who together with the Father and the Son is to be worshipped and glorified.

II. We believe that the providence of God, by which He executes His eternal purposes in the government of the world, extends to all persons and all events; yet so that the freedom and responsibility of man are not impaired, and sin is the act of the creature alone.

III. We believe that man was made in the image of God, that he might know, love, obey, and enjoy Him forever; that our first parents by disobedience fell under the righteous divine condemnation; and that, as a consequence of this apostasy, all their descendants are so alienated from God that there is no salvation from the guilt and power of sin except through God's redeeming, regenerating, and sanctifying grace.

IV. We believe that God, who is Love, would have all men return to Him; that to this end He has made Himself known not only through the works of nature, the course of His providence and the consciences of men, but also through supernatural revelations made especially to a chosen people, and above all, when the fullness of time was come, through Jesus Christ His Son.

V. We believe that the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments are the infallible record of God's revelation of Himself in the work of redemption, being written by men under the special inspiration of the Holy Spirit; that they are able to make wise unto salvation; and that they constitute the only authoritative standard by which religious teaching and human conduct are to be regulated and judged.

VI. We believe that the love of God to sinful men has found its highest expression in the redemptive work of His Son; who became man, uniting His divine nature with our human nature in one person; who was tempted like other men, yet without sin; who by His humiliation, His holy obedience, His vicarious sufferings and death, and His resurrection, became a perfect Redeemer; and whose expiatory sacrifice of Himself for the sins of the world declares the righteousness and compassion of God, and is the sole and sufficient ground of forgiveness and of reconciliation with Him.

VII. We believe that Jesus Christ, after He had risen from the dead, ascended into heaven, where, as the one mediator between God and man, He carries forward His work of saving men; that the Holy Spirit is sent to convict of sin, and to lead to repentance and faith; and that those who through renewing grace turn to righteousness, and trust in Jesus Christ as their Redeemer, were chosen in Him before the foundation of the world, receive for His sake the forgiveness of their sins, and are made the children of God.

VIII. We believe that those who are thus justified and regenerated, grow in grace through fellowship with Christ, the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, and obedience to the truth; that a holy life is the certain fruit and indispensable evidence of saving faith; and that the believer's continuance in a holy life is assured by the preserving grace of God.

IX. We believe that Jesus Christ came to establish among men the kingdom of love, righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit; that to Jesus Christ, who is the sole Head of this kingdom, Christians are directly responsible in faith and conduct; and that to H m all have immediate access without mediatorial or priestly intervention.

X. We believe that the spiritual Church of Christ comprises all true believers; that it is the duty of believers to associate themselves in local and visible churches for the confession of Christ before men, for the maintenance of worship, for the observance of the sacraments, for the promotion of spiritual growth and fellowship, and for the conversion of men; that these churches under the guidance of the Holy Scriptures, and in conference with one another, may severally determine their organization, statements of belief, and forms of worship, may appoint and set apart their own ministers, and should co-operate in the work which Christ has committed to them for the furtherance of the gospel throughout the world.

XI. We believe that Christ has appointed but two sacraments: Baptism, to be administered to believers and their children, as a seal of the new covenant, and a sign of cleansing from sin, of union to Christ, and of the promised gift of the Holy Spirit; and the Lord's Supper, to be administered to visible believers, as a memorial of His atoning death, and a means whereby He confirms and strengthens the spiritual union and communion of believers with Himself.

XII. We believe that the Lord's Day, the Christian Sabbath, should be observed as a day of holy rest and worship.

XIII. We believe that the kingdom of Christ will prevail over all the earth; and we look for the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ, the resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust, the end of the world, and the final judgment, the issues of which will be determined by the deeds done in the body; so that the wicked shall go away into everlasting punishment and the righteous into everlasting life.

UNIVERSITY OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK.—The Council and Faculty have determined to endeavor to hold "an old-fashioned Commencement Week even in the city of New York." May they have encouraging success! The following are the appointments:

Sunday, June 13th, at 8 P. M., in the University Place Church, upon the corner of University place and Tenth street, Baccalaureate Sermon by the Chancellor.

Monday, June 14th, at 8 P. M., in the College Chapel, Washington square, East, Phi Beta Kappa Oration, by Charles W. Baird, D.D., of Rye, N. Y.

Tuesday, June 15th, at 2.30 P. M., in the College Chapel, Class Day Exercises.

Wednesday, June 16th, at 10 A. M., in the College Chapel, Euclean Prize Essays.

Thursday, June 17th, at 8 P. M., in the Academy of Music, The Commencement.

Friday, June 18th, at 7 P. M., in the College Chapel, Annual Meeting of the Alumni Association, with a brief address by the Vice Chancellor.

All, save the last named, are public.

REV. DR. JOHN W. NEVIN died at Lancaster, Pa., on the 6th, in his 84th year. He was born in Franklin Co., Pa., on Feb. 20th, 1803. His grandmother on the father's side was the sister of Hugh Williamson, one of the framers of the Federal Constitution. He graduated at Union College in 1821, and at Princeton Seminary in 1826, when he became temporarily Professor of Oriental and Biblical Literature. In 1829 he was chosen Professor of the same department in the Western Seminary at Pittsburg, and in 1840 became Professor of Theology in the Seminary of the Reformed Church (German) at Mercersburg, Pa., where he remained eleven years, and also edited the Mercersburg Review and acted as President of Marshall College. Since then he has lived in retirement, except that he became again President of Marshall College from 1866 to 1876.

Financial.

TUESDAY, June 8th.

THE public debt statement, less available cash in the treasury, showed a reduction during May of $8,828,566. The funded debt bearing interest was reduced $9,715,000, but the debt on which interest has ceased, that is, called bonds not presented for redemption, increased $1,300,000 during the month. The main items of the debt on June 1st were: Bonds, $1,220,650,312, including $64,623,512 issued in behalf of the Pacific R. R.; legal tender notes, $346,738,486; fractional currency, $6,954,088; gold certificates, $80,120,025; silver certificates, $89,184,129. Probably some millions of legal tender notes have been lost or destroyed. The fractional currency lost or destroyed is reckoned at $8,375,000.

The imports of merchandise at this port last week were valued at $6,433,149, and the exports at $6,134,666. The export of specie was $2,253,479. Sterling exchange yesterday sold at $4.87 for 60 day bills and $4.89 for demand.

The bank statement for the week showed an increase in loans of $1,283,500 and in legal tenders of $100,600, a decrease in specie of $2,077,800, and in deposits of $858,300. The surplus of reserve was reduced $1,762,625, making it $12,067,975. Money loaned on call yesterday at 1 1-2 to 2 per cent. The rate on the best business paper is from 3 1-2 to 4 1-2 per cent.

The Stock Market has been fairly active and prices are somewhat higher. Thoroughly good investment bonds are strongly held and very dear.

The foreign grain markets have been rather weaker for a few days. Rumor says that the harvest in Europe will not be as good as last year, and that in Australia and New Zeeland the crop is smaller than for many years. The visible supply of wheat last week showed a decrease of not far from 3 millions of bushels, and this week it is reckoned will show a decrease of 2 1-2 millions. Quotations yesterday were: Wheat here 87 1-2, in Chicago 77; corn here 43 1-2, in Chicago 35 3-4; oats here 34 1-4, in Chicago 27. The prices of provisions are generally steady. The market for hay and straw is well supplied and the demand is light. Choice timothy is worth 80 to 85 cents, and No. 1 long rye straw also 80 to 85 cents; oat straw 35 to 45 cents and wheat straw the same. The closing quotations for cotton yesterday were: June 9.14-15, July 9.21-22, Augt. 9.33-34, Sept. 9.19-20, Oct. 9.14-15.

We hear only commendatory words about Mr. E. P. Gates, President of the Merchant's Bank, Grand Forks, Dakota, who makes loans for Eastern investors on lands in Dakota. This is the anwer we have made to those who have consulted us in person, and this we say to those contemplating such investments.

TUESDAY, 8.—The Home Rule bill defeated last night in Parliament by a vote of 341 against it to 311 for it. The House was crowded and the excitement during and after the debate unparalleled. Mr. Goschen, Liberal, opened with a slashing speech, full of accusations, Mr. Parnell followed with a calm, strong speech, which would perhaps have saved the bill if made earlier in the session. He made a great impression when he declared that before the last election the Tories promised to bring a a Home Rule bill if successful and a Land bill more extreme than that proposed by Mr. Gladstone. The Premier closed the debate with a long and powerful speech .... DEATHS.

HUBBARD.—At Flatlands, L. I., May 25, Asher H. Hubbard, in the 77th year of his age.

Mr. Hubbard was an active member of the Flatlands Church, and at the time of his death had just completed his term as elder. He exhibited his love for the Master by a consistent life and godly example, also by a cheerful liberality in sustaining the means of grace and in aiding objects of Christian benevolence. He was ever a faithful officer, prompt in the discharge of duty, wise in counsel, and in his character there was a happy blending of progress and conservatism. The church and community realize that they have had a severe loss.

Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord.

I do not believe that Ayer's Sarsaparilla has an equal as a remedy for Scrofulous Humors. It is pleasant to take, gives strength and vigor to the body, and produces a more permanent, lasting, result than any medicine I ever used.—E. Haines, No. Lindale, O.

I have used Ayer's Sarsaparilla, in my family, for Scrofula, and know, if it is taken faithfully, it will thoroughly eradicate this terrible disease.—W. F. Fowler, M. D., Greenville, Tenn.

For forty years I have suffered with Erysipelas. I have tried all sorts of remedies for my complaint, but found no relief until I commenced using Ayer's Sarsaparilla. After taking ten bottles of this medicine I am completely cured. —Mary C. Amesbury, Rockport, Me.

I have suffered, for years, from Catarrh, which was so severe that it destroyed my appetite and weakened my system. After trying other remedies, and getting no relief, I began to take Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and, in a few months, was cured. —Susan L. Cook, 90 Albany st., Boston Highlands, Mass.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla is superior to any blood purifier that I have ever tried. I have taken it for Scrofula, Canker, and Salt Rheum, and received much benefit from it. It is good, also, for a weak stomach.—Millie Jane Peirce, South Bradford, Mass.

The Church.

The Supreme Duty of the Church.

BY REV. G. WYCKOFF.

THE supreme duty of the Church is not in its externals. It does not consist in wondrous architectural designs, in massive and ornate houses of worship, in an impressive ritual, classic music, a chaste and eloquent sermon. The first duty of the Church lies far beyond and above these. Possession of all these often produces a forgetfulness of the first claim. One of the glaring errors of the Romish Church during the early ages was the elevation of these above its first duty.

That individual or church is condemned by the Gospel who puts glitter and externality in place of real duty. The fraudulent banker or broker cannot gloss over his crimes by princely donations to charity. Churches guilty of omitting their first duty cannot atone for it by flashy externals, which are but appeals to their own pride and selfishness. One thing the rich young man in the Gospel lacked. The Pharisees were condemned for making a fair outward appearance. The first duty is confined neither to Jerusalem or Samaria, but goes far beyond these.

It is not to formulate or defend creeds or confessions. This has been done—thanks to past generations. We glory in the triumphs of their victories. The Justification by Faith, the by grace are ye saved, the law a shadow of things to come, of Paul, come to us with the fire and heat of conflict still upon them—a conflict with gnosticism, idolatry and Jewish prejudice. The Apostolic, Athanasian and Nicene Creeds, the Belgic and Westminster Confessions, the Canons of the Synod of Dort, the Heidelbergh and Westminster Catechisms,—these tell of a struggle with Sabellius and Arius, with Pelagius and Socinus, with Luther and Arminius. With the light of these pure doctrines we can go forth to banish the darkness from the mind, the hardness from the heart, but we look beyond this for our duty.

The supreme duty of the Church is not found in the promotion of good government. Between the Church and good government there is no variance. Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, is the order, and respect for law, order and civil rulers. Trajan, in a letter to Pliny in the year 107, A.D, gives a remarkable testimony to the pure life and the good citizenship of the early Christians. He said that he had not discovered any wickedness that the Christians were guilty of, nor anything done by them contrary to the laws; only that rising early, they sung a hymn to Christ, that they condemned adultery, murder and all such crimes, and that they acted in all things according to the laws. Much as we condemn anarchy, socialism, dynamite and strikes, and maintain that the Gospel hath power to leaven all troubles and heal all wounds, still we do not find the great duty here; it is beyond this,—far more comprehensive, more vital, more plain.

What, then, is the supreme duty of the Church? It lies beyond the mere limit of our own selfishness. It sees the field ripe for the harvest; it sees three-fourths of the world yet unsaved. It sees the dying order of our Great Commander yet unfulfilled, "Go ye forth and preach the Gospel to every creature."

In this, then, we see the first duty of the Church. It is to preach deliverance to the captive, to reveal unto the region sitting in darkness a great light, to carry to the lost nations of the earth the glorious intelligence that the Son of Man is come to save that which was lost. Very appropriate was the reply of the Duke of Wellington to a young clergyman who said, "Does not your Grace think it almost useless and extravagant to preach the Gospel to the Hindoos." "Look, sir, to your marching orders," was the answer. Preach the Gospel to every creature. And the Church has just come into that position today in which it is able to obey this command. It has wealth, influence and material. In no other age of its existence has it been so ready.

In early Apostolic times it was on the defensive. It was compelled to increase its membership, establish its creed, defend itself from enemies. During mediæval times, in its corrupt state, when it had power and influence it used it for unjust ends—in establishing a hierarchy, creating orders of monks, controling the world. After the Reformation its numbers were depleted, its influence slight, its power meagre. After a struggle of three centuries we have just arrived at our present influential position, and today we are fully able to carry out our marching orders. And the Church is just beginning to wake up to a consciousness of this fact. More has been done to execute this command in the last fifty years than in the previous five hundred. This is truly a missionary age. Alliances, Conventions and Boards discuss the best measures and adopt the best mode for executing them. Never was a time when we had so much missionary intelligence. The verification of our Lord's promise, "Lo, I am with you," and the Spirit's presence is manifest in increased contributions, in the willingness of so many to give themselves for the work, in the readiness of the nations to receive.

By this dying command, then, of our Saviour, by the promise of His presence and Spirit, by the calling of many to the work, by revealing the inadequacy of any other means and opening the nations for the reception of the Gospel,—by these and the present status of the Church, He reveals in unmistakable language the supreme duty of the Church.

The promise is that they who turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars forever and ever. We are very apt to limit this reward to the missionary alone. It is to all, who by their prayers and gifts seek to bring in the heathen for Christ's inheritance. Many are seeking where they shall invest their surplus capital or savings. If they desire the largest interest and best return, let them put it, not in banks, corporations or bonds, but put it in that great concern which looks forward to and is to hasten the second coming of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ with power and glory from on high, through the publishing of His Gospel to every creature.

Our duty individually is to pray, and, in order to make our prayers effectual, to give our treasures, for where the treasure is there will the heart be. How shall they hear without a preacher? How shall they preach except they be sent?

International Sunday-School Lesson.

BY REV. JOHN C. VAN DEVENTER.

June 20th.—"Jesus and Abraham."—John 8: 31-38, 44-59.

Golden Text.—"Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day; and he saw it and was glad."—JOHN 8: 56.

CENTRAL TRUTH.—"I AM."—JOHN 8: 58.

INTRODUCTION.

AFTER the events of the great day of the feast, Jesus retired for the night to the Mount of Olives, and returned to the temple on the next morning in order to resume the instruction of the people. His discourse on this occasion begins at verse 13, where He proclaims Himself The Light of the World, probably referring to the unusual illumination which formed part of the celebration of the feast of Tabernacles. In the course of these remarks He clearly foretold His crucifixion by the Jews, where He speaks of them as lifting up the Son of Man. As a result of these instructions many among the people believed on Him, and He then directed His further remarks to their confirmation in the faith.

THE LESSON.

I. THE CHILDREN OF ABRAHAM.—VS. 31-38.

V. 31.—"If ye abide in my word." Those to whom He spoke had been impressed by the truth, but they were yet to be tested. They must pass through the fire of temptation in order to prove what manner of spirit they were of. To abide in Christ's Word is to have it as much the element of our daily life as air is the element of our physical existence. "Then are ye my disciples indeed." Many had followed Jesus for a season, and had already become offended because of His word; some of those who still adhered to Him were yet to prove faithless, and He warned these new disciples that endurance must be the test of their professions.

V. 32.—"Ye shall know the truth." They were just entering school, and were to go on to know the Lord. The disciples learned a great deal more about Jesus after His resurrection and by the teaching of the Holy Spirit than during all their intercourse with Him. "The truth shall make you free." By bringing them into harmony with their Maker and thus restoring their lives to their true conditions.

V. 33.—"We be Abraham's seed, and were never in bondage to any man." While these words seem to have come from those who were ready to call themselves disciples, yet they sound very much like a Pharisaic objection. The Jewish pride of race was, and is, most intense. They regarded themselves, by the mere fact of physical descent from Abraham, entitled to all manner of privileges, temporal and spiritual. They did not imagine that they needed any change in themselves. So great was their sense of national superiority that they refused to recognize the plain facts of history, such as the bondage in Egypt, the captivity in Babylon, or their existing relation to the Romans.

V. 34.—"Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin" It is possible that the second word, "sin," is an interpolation, and the omission serves to bring out the truth more strongly as an answer to their objection. "Whosoever committeth sin is the bondservant."

V. 35.—"The servant abideth not in the house for ever." It is difficult to see the exact application of this clause. It can hardly be a parallel to that passage in Hebrews where Moses and Christ are contrasted, and the most obvious sense appears to be that the pleasures which the slaves of sin imagine that they enjoy are at best uncertain and fleeting. "The Son abideth ever." His relation to the Father is sure, and He is able to bring His true disciples into the same relation, hence

V. 36.—"If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed." The motions of the planets are free because in accordance with the design of their creation. If one of them should become a wanderer, and then be brought back to its true relations, that bringing back would be a making free again. In this way Jesus makes those free whom He brings back to love and obedience.

V. 37.—"I know that ye are Abraham's seed." The fact of their descent could not be gainsaid, but that only intensified their guilt. "Ye seek to kill me." Their animosity toward Jesus was a bar sinister upon their shield. They were disproving their lineage by their works. "Because my word has no place in you"—finds no welcome, meets no answering impulse, is despised and rejected.

V. 38.—"I speak that which I have seen with my Father." The expression, "with my Father," is similar to that in John 1, where the word is spoken of as being "with God." It implies intimate association and fellowship. "Ye do that which ye have seen with your father." We know that Jesus had in mind their dependence upon the devil as their spiritual progenitor; but he withholds the bald statement of that unpleasant truth until conscience has had an opportunity to work.

II. THE CHILDREN OF THE DEVIL.—VS. 44-48.

V. 44.—The omitted verses give us the step whereby Jesus leads up to the charge, "Ye are of your father the devil." Boasting of their relation to Abraham, they had cultivated rather a false relation until all resemblance to the Father of the faithful had been obliterated by an ever increasing resemblance to their foster father. "The lusts of your father ye will do." Literally, "will to do, or choose to do." Their dispositions and affiliations are all satanic. "He was a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth." This murderous and false nature was being manifested by the Jews in their treatment of Jesus.

V. 45.—"Because I tell you the truth ye believe me not." There was a necessary antipathy between the truth which Christ uttered and the love of a lie which these people cherished.

V. 46.—"Which of you convinceth me of sin?" He boldly challenges their charges. A false teacher will be false in life. If his words were untrue his life would necessarily be unworthy, but the acknowledged purity and sublimity of his life was an emphatic endorsement of his teachings.

V. 47.—This verse is His answer to His own question, which the Jews could not answer, "Why do ye not believe me?" They did not and could not believe Him, because He spoke God's words and they were in rebellion against God, and unable to hear and recognize His voice.

V. 48.—"Then answered the Jews,....Thou art a Samaritan, and hast a devil." No more insulting language could have been used by a Jew of that day than these words, which show the intensity of the spite with which they regarded Jesus of Nazareth.

III. THE SON OF GOD.—VS. 49-59.

V. 49.—"I have not a devil." Jesus meets this insult with a calm denial, and proceeds to set their conduct still more clearly before them. "I honor my Father, and ye do dishonor me." Jesus was living as the worthy Son of God, while they were the degenerate seed of Abraham. If they had any real reverence for God in their hearts they could not thus have abused His Son.

V. 50.—"I seek not mine own glory." Personally these insults were as nothing to Jesus. Confident in His own rectitude and the Father's approval, He could welcome the scoff of the world. "There is one that seeketh and judgeth." These insults were not to be unnoticed or unrevenged. The Father seeks His Son's honor and will have in derision all those who "set themselves against the LORD and against His anointed."

V. 51.—"If a man keep my saying, he shall never see death." This assertion was equivalent to saying that He had destroyed him who had the power of death, and was about to triumph over Satan, the murderer.

V. 52.—This sublime truth met with only fresh contumely. "Now we know that thou hast a devil." Abraham, Moses, Isaiah, and all the fathers had yielded to death, and here was one who claimed the power of bestowing immortality upon all those who would become his followers. The words sounded both absurd and blasphemous.

V. 53.—"Art thou greater than our father Abraham?" This question shows that these men understood the drift of Christ's sayings and that He was claiming Divine prerogatives for Himself.

V. 54.—Jesus here, as so often before, refers His case to His Father. He distinctly states, however, that His Father is He whom they call their God.

V. 55.—"Ye have not known him; but I know him." The contrast here is not only between ignorance and knowledge, but between different kinds of knowledge. Ye have not learned to know Him, but I have always known Him by an immediate knowledge.

V. 56.—"Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day." Rejoiced in anticipation of that day. "He saw it and was glad." By faith anticipated the life and work of the Redeemer.

V. 57.—"Hast thou seen Abraham?' This last statement of Jesus was more than they could tolerate. His assumptions were growing more and more astounding every moment, and they knew not to what this might grow.

V. 58.—"Before Abraham was, I am." Before Abraham came into beginning, as a creature, I had possession of life in Myself. This was equivalent to laying claim to the ineffable name Jehovah.

V. 59.—"Then took they up stones to cast at him" These last words seemed to justify immediate action against a blasphemer, and without waiting for trial or condemnation they were about to take the law in their own hands. "But Jesus hid himself,....and so passed by" His hour was not yet come. His rejection and death were to be accomplished in such a way as to lift Him up above the world as Moses had lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, but these angry mutterings of the storm gave no uncertain sound,—His doom was already sealed.

LESSONS FOR TO-DAY.

1. The word of Jesus is the daily bread of His disciples.

2. We grow like Christ as we learn more of Christ.

3. Sin is a tyrant and deceiver.

4. Christ makes true manhood possible.

5. Our lives tell the source of our inspiration.

6. Satan is our destroyer; Christ is our Saviour. Choose ye.

7. Those who refuse the words of Christ show that they are not of God.

8. Be careful not to be found among the enemies of Christ.

"Black Your Heels!"

HOW often I say this to my children! It is interesting to go into some room, filled with boys and girls, and notice the heels of their boots and shoes. Many of them will be found to be brown and rusty.

It is only a careful boy who blacks the heels of his boots. Most boys put their foot up on a chair or box, put a good shine on the parts of their boots that they can see easily, and go off with a good deal of satisfaction.

Carelessness, that is what rusty heels mean. Carefulness, that is what it takes to make your heels shine. Look well to your heels!

It would be all very well, seemingly, to neglect the heels, if boys and girls could always face people. I know a good many persons who think if they can face the world well, appear honest and kind and good, they are doing all that is required. Back out of sight, as they suppose, in the home perhaps, may be in school, or in business, are the little dishonest, rude or careless acts that "nobody" sees. Is there nobody to see? What do you suppose the Lord thinks of those unshined moral "heels?"

How shortsighted such people are! Do they suppose they can go along and never turn around? Do they suppose no one is ever to come after? Just because they are smart enough, or careless enough, or willfully blind enough to see only part, do they suppose no one else will see the whole?

A little girl was sent to put her bureau drawer in order the other day. She smoothed over the pile of articles, and then carefully spread her nubia over the whole. A boy was sent to put the back yard in order. How well it looked from the window when he had finished Did he think any one would look into the corner behind the woodshed? Alas, for the "heels" of the bureau drawer and back-yard! Work half done, the heels all unblacked.

There is another reason for keeping our heels in order; sometime we may want to turn and run. We want to have the privilege of running, if necessary. Sometimes we unknowingly get into places that it is well to get out of. How would we feel if those who had allured us in could turn and say, "There he goes! Look at his heels! A pretty one he is to make believe he is too good for this place. Why, he doesn't even black his heels!"

Only the parts well done—carefully, conscientiously, honestly done—will ever stand for our credit. The all-seeing Eye looks to every part. The world sees a fair, shining top and toe; but the heel—the little, partly hidden, carelessly or willfully neglected part, is seen by Him who looks at our whole lives.

"Black your heels!"—Juniata Stafford, in The Congregationalist.

THE daughters of the Princess of Wales had a very jolly holiday at Torquay. They went shopping by themselves and ran into place after place, to make their little purchases, with evident delight at their freedom. On the second day of their stay they appeared in fine, buoyant spirits at a boot store with a short stick which, they explained, was the length of their mother's foot, and they wanted a pair of rubbers, "goloshes" they called them "for mamma." It was quite a comical scene, for the salesman entered into the spirit of their fun and tried the stick in all sizes and conditions of overshoes until the young ladies were satisfied. They had them wrapped up, paid for them, and walked away, with the parcel under the arm of the youngest of the three, for they quite refused to have their purchases "sent" while they were at Torquay.—The Advance.

A SMALL boy writes: "One day Billy come home holdin' a little mole by the tail, which a bad boy had guv him, and it was alive. When my sister see him, she said, 'O you crewel, crewel boy! Throw it into the fire this very minute.'"

Een-dracht maakt macht.

VOL. LVII.—No. 24. WHOLE No. 2916. NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 16, 1886. $2.65 A YEAR IN ADVANCE. No. 48 CHURCH STREET.

EDITORS: Rev. JOHN M. FERRIS, D.D. Rev. N. H. VAN ARSDALE.
ASSOCIATE EDITOR: MRS. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

THE GENERAL SYNOD adjourned at midday on Friday. So long a session has seldom been held. Much important business was intelligently and conscientiously attended to. The record is unusually interesting. Our report ends this week with Thursday evening. What was done on Friday we hope to print next week.

THE REVIEW of the Sabbath-school lessons of the quarter will be found to be admirably arranged by the Rev. Mr. Van Deventer, in the place belonging to it. The classification of subjects will help the memory and tend to make a permanent impression. As a guide for teachers it is very valuable, and, we think, they will be thankful for it.

NO MORE IMPORTANT testimony, in relation to the progress of Christianity in Japan, has been given than that to be found on the fourteenth page, coming from a Japanese gentleman. The Japan Mail is a secular paper and aims to reflect public sentiment. Next week we hope to give what the writer of the article thinks ought to be done hereafter for the extension of Christianity in the empire, and what the Christian Japanese paper has said in regard to his recommendations.

FOUR THOUSAND seven hundred and nineteen souls were added to the churches of our communion last year on confession of faith in our Lord and Redeemer. So the Committee of the Synod reports. That is something to be very thankful for; but ought we to be satisfied with it. Let us not be content with the fact that it is above the average result of past years—above the average of other denominations as well as of our own. Is it what 83,000 Christians ought to gather in in twelve months? If our example, our prayers, our zeal, our activity, our faith, were what they ought to be, would not the fruit be twice that of the year just closed?

THERE ARE NOT a few clergymen who occasionally make their second service on the Lord's day one of praise without sermon, and who diversify the singing by remarks respecting the origin, character or history of the hymns sung. Such an exercise has been found interesting and profitable. Those who wish to engage in it will find no book better suited for their purpose than the new volume, "English Hymns," by the Rev. S. W. Duffield, just issued by Funk & Wagnalls. The nicely printed octavo treats nearly, if not quite, all the well-known hymns, gives full and satisfactory information, is very well written and may be relied upon as trustworthy. Certainly it has no rival in Britain or America.

IT IS NOT OFTEN that Christian people welcome on a Sabbath day a cloudy sky, threatening rain, such as that of last Sunday. Yet, while regretting the influence of such a sky on the attendance upon the services of Christian churches, the decent people of suburban towns cannot refrain from saying to themselves and sometimes aloud to their families, "Now we shall have a quiet, restful day." For the clouds and chilling winds prevent the incursions of the Sabbath breakers of the cities. The townsmen are not compelled to guard their flower and vegetable gardens, their fruit trees and blooming shrubs, from fierce thieves who answer words of warning with showers of stones. Only police protection saves the gardens from depredation and defacement, and so general has become the demoralization of the times that the police are slow to give protection. Have decent Christian people, within reach of the city's Sabbath breakers, any right to a peaceful Sunday?

OUR CHURCHES at New Brunswick still know how to abound in hospitality. It is no light matter to provide entertainment for a body of one hundred and fifty men for a period of eight days; yet so accustomed are the good people at this Mecca of the Dutch Church to dispensing hospitality that the duty is always accomplished gracefully and satisfactorily. At the church there were many signs of thoughtful care for the Synod's convenience and comfort, and Committees had ample facilities for their work in the various apartments of the lecture room adjoining the church. Indeed, all the requirements of the Synod were anticipated and provided for. The members were charmed with the beautiful display of roses, furnished day after day by Professor Jacob Cooper for the President's table, and the numberless button-hole bouquets supplied by the same generous hand for the members themselves.

THE MOST SERIOUS information conveyed to the General Synod was in regard to the large falling off in the number of young men in preparation for the ministry in our chief college and seminary, and the prospect that the decline for a few years to come will be still greater than for the past year or two. It is only necessary to mention a deficiency so important in order to arouse many of those who love the Church to such prayer and effort as may be needful to remove it. Have we not been rather negligent in this matter? Has not our attention been so occupied with other and essential parts of the work and needs of the Church that we have given very little attention to soliciting recruits for the ranks of the ministry? Has the work of the ministry and the claims it has upon the young men of the churches received its place in the enumeration of duties to be performed? The claims and the promise of other professions and pursuits are well known by young men, but how seldom are they told of the importance, the honor, the dignity, the reward of faithful service in the ministry of the Gospel! Christian parents need instruction and exhortation in regard to the character and claims of this Divinely appointed profession, that they may be led to consecrate their boys to the Lord, to desire for them such an occupation and to present it to them as deserving of their conscientious consideration. Not a few young men, as we believe, need to be reminded of their duty to at least consider the propriety of devoting their lives to the work of a Christian pastor, and not a few, we believe, in the hesitation with which many a young man makes a choice of his life-work, will be thankful to the pastor or Christian friend who will aid him with a thoughtful opinion and judicious counsel. It is very natural that a young man should be reluctant to decide altogether upon his own judgment to give himself to such a work. It is probable that not a few who would honor the calling are in a condition of indecision as to their duty and fitness, are inclined to make such a use of life, but feeling the importance of the step and controlled by a distrust of themselves—a praiseworthy and most promising modesty—need only the advice of a parent, pastor or friend to bring them to the conclusion to prepare to preach the Gospel.

In the Evangelist of last week the Rev. J. K. Wight describes a trait of the ministry of the venerable Rev. Dr. Snodgrass who died a few weeks ago. These are his words:

There are two things which especially interested me in the ministry of Dr. Snodgrass. One was the interest which he took in leading men into the ministry. I knew with what desire he wished that his second son might undertake this work, and how sadly he was disappointed. But he did not remit his efforts with regard to others. The turning point in my life in that direction was when, as my father's pastor, he called and spoke about my going to college. I had other plans, and specified some of them. When he had listened to them, and my father had expressed his willingness to send me, he turned to me and said, "Go to college if you have the opportunity, no matter what you intend doing, even if you expect to saw wood for a living." Dr. F. R. Masters, for seventeen years pastor at Matteawan, N. Y., and who for health's sake had turned aside from his studies, told me that it was Dr. Snodgrass's encouragement and advice that led him, after he was married and had two or three children, to sell his farm, go to the seminary, and prepare for the work of the ministry. So Dr. Charles H. Reed, for years pastor of a church in Richmond, Va., was a merchant and postmaster in Troy, but had shown great aptness in teaching a large Bible class and in public speaking, and here again the pastor's influence was at work in leading him into the ministry. Doubtless there are many other cases where, if the facts were known, his influence would be seen.

MR. HERBERT SPENCER in the Nineteenth Century for May concluded a series of articles on "The Factors of Organic Evolution." It is important to have from so accomplished an advocate, who is accepted by the out-and-out evolutionists, an opinion on such a subject. As one reads these papers he wonders at the mingled strength and weakness of the reasoning on which the hypothesis rests. There is no weakness in Mr. Spencer's writing; it is clear and vigorous. But the final conclusion, which seems to be a section tacked to the last paper, not because it is necessary or because it is vitally connected with what precedes it, but because Mr. Spencer wished to say it, is amazing. He alludes to Prof. Huxley's address at the unveiling of the statue of Mr. Darwin in the South Kensington Museum, and proceeds on this wise: "Deprecating the supposition that an authoritative sanction was given by the ceremony to the current ideas concerning organic evolution, he (Huxley) said that 'science commits suicide when it adopts a creed.'" The words are not used in a religious sense. They mean that a scientific creed worthy of unhesitating belief does not exist in Mr. Huxley's opinion. And Mr. Spencer endorses the sentiment. The words mean that the scientific observer should have a perfectly free mind looking out of his eyes; should see facts as they are, with no regard for existing opinions, and make such deductions only as the facts evidently declare. To have a creed, to go about applying received principles is an injury, a hindrance; as Mr. Spencer adds, biologists in applying their belief in regard to the origin of species "have been narrowed."

While there is truth in these cautions, there is also a very humiliating confession. Such gentlemen as Huxley and Spencer being the judges, the outcome of the earnest and incessant scientific investigations of the past thirty years, the patient and laborious watchfulness, the dissection and examination with the microscope, the enormous accumulation of facts, is not a scientific system which is helpful, but a creed which narrows and destroys the man who accepts it and takes it with him into the field of observation or employs it as a guide or assistant in the process of educing principles from facts. No comment on such an admission is necessary.

Another important statement which occupies a large part of this last paper, which, indeed, is the chief theme of the paper, is that the influence of environment is often exhausted upon the exterior of organisms and does not affect the interior constitution or action. "The operation of those forces which produced the primary differentiation of outer from inner" is a fair specimen of the language used. We have written "is often exhausted," but Mr. Spencer's language leads to the inference that it is usually exhausted on the exterior of organisms. Everybody will see at once how mightily this fact tells against the assertion that environment, that is, the circumstances in which it lives, have a mighty influence in evolving a new species out of an old one. If the environment does not touch the interior it cannot help to or produce such an evolution.

FOR WHOSE GOOD?—This question is often asked in reference to the law requiring the government to buy and coin two millions of silver every month, but the answer does not seem to be forthcoming. It cannot be for the benefit of the owners of silver mines, for the price has been steadily falling, and is now lower than it has been for years. Besides, why should the law favor this class of the community rather than the producers of any other article of commerce? Nor can it be in the interest of the people at large, for they dislike the bulky coin, and find it a great saving of expense and trouble to have small bills. People who have large amounts to pay, weekly or monthly, in small sums, complain bitterly of the inconvenience to which the burdensome coin subjects them. Nor can it be for the government's own sake that the monthly purchase and coinage continues. The accumulation of coin prevents the payment of just so much debt, and besides requires expensive vaults and storing places to be constructed and maintained for its safe keeping. The question recurs, then, who is benefitted by this singular law, one that has no parallel in the history of this country or any other?

A WORD TO THE WISE.—There seems to be a very needful caution in the following short extract from the Apologetics of Henry B. Smith (p. 174), and one which the friends of truth would do well to heed:

"In evolution we must concede—and appropriate—all that is proved true, as we have often done before. Those hurt the good cause who stoutly maintain the unbending literality of their own interpretation of the sacred text, and anathematize all who will not repeat their formulae. There are some who, if a Christian utters the word evolution, accuse him of playing into the hands of the infidel and the atheist. Those evolutionists who are not Christians just want Christians to say that all evolution undermines the Bible and that every form of Darwinism is atheism. But, to say that species are entirely arbitrary, that there is no sort of physical connection or descent between them, is to advance a purely scientific, not a religious or Christian, theory."

OUTCOME OF THE LABOR TROUBLES. . . . CURIOUS FEATURES OF THE STRIKES. . . . "BOHEMIANS." . . . . JERRY McAULEY'S MEMORIAL. . . . DECORATION DAY.

AFTER all, the recent labor troubles, though a costly experience, have plainly wrought for good. They have taught workmen that no substantial gain for their cause can be made in this country, which does not carry with it the sympathy and common sense of the nation; and that no one class can press its own claims to the disregard or detriment of the others, without ultimately finding itself face to face with an impassible and crushing barrier. At the same time, they have revealed to employers and capitalists the power of combined labor to destroy their profits, if not their business. And I am confident that both parties will hereafter be far less ready to bring matters to the issue of a strike, till every effort has been made to forestall or to arrange the differences. And the premature disclosure of the anarchists and their plots, by what they supposed was a favorable crisis, has brought this nation once more to revise its theory of liberty, and to demonstrate to the world the stability and force of our institutions. It has also startled the unthinking and misguided working-people into a realization of the precipice towards which they were allowing themselves to be hurried like sheep. The utter antagonism of the Red Flag and of the Stars and Stripes could not be too soon seen, and they stood out in clear and angry colors in the lurid scenes through which we have been passing.

Another fact was impressed upon the public mind,—I might say, in most cases revealed for the first time. This was that railroads, though built with private capital and taking toll in compensation for the traffic and travel which they promote, are public highways whose paramount ownership and control belong to the people, and whose use for certain purposes and under certain conditions is leased to a corporation. Accordingly any attempt to obstruct travel or business on such roads is an assault upon the people and the State, and becomes an act of outlawry and treason and must be treated as such whether the assault be committed by an individual or an organization, by employes of the road or by a band of savages or brigands. There is perhaps needless severity, but there is stern logic, in the proposed action of the Mexican Congress, making it a capital offence to put obstructions in the way of trains or to cut telegraph wires.

These outbreaks are now seen to have been a sort of popular craze. It is curious to look back upon some of their features and incidents. The epidemic extended to the boys. The bootblacks of Louisville struck for ten cents a "shine." Some school boys in Joliet, Ill., struck for a longer recess, and a number of them stationed themselves at the doors with clubs to keep out any who were disposed to come in at the regular time. At Boston two of the public schools struck, one for a single session and the other for a longer recess and shorter hours of study. The former marched in procession to other schools, trying to persuade them to join. They assaulted one of the teachers of a non-striking school, and formed across the side streets to prevent other boys from getting to their school. It was necessary to summon the police and the power of the truancy law, in order to subdue them. On the other hand, a labor organization in Brooklyn threatened a Grand Army Post with a boycott, because it employs two or three little boys as drummers whose fathers are non unionists. It will not soon be forgotten how the little crippled brushmakers were boycotted in New York, nor how Mrs. Landgraff's daughter was thrown out of her situation in a totally different business because her mother employed non union bakers, nor how the Widow Vonderbrake of New Haven was bullied to stop taking a boycotted newspaper of that city. Such things ensured a state of popular indignation, the result of which seems to indicate that the days of the boycott are ended.

The Observer mentions that more than a third of the advertisements in a recent number of the "Workingman's Friend," a boycott sheet, were those of drinking saloons. Mr. Powderly may well appeal to workmen "above all thing" to "keep out of whiskey shops." It is drink more than anything else that keeps the laboring classes from getting on in the world; it was drink more than anything else which fed the flames of the late riots and outrages. In Chicago, the rioters sacked a drug store and poured "wine" of colchicum and other poisons down their throats, so that a number of them died in the utmost agony. Upon one of the men who were engaged in this destructive savagery were found a number of needle-cases, and a placard with the words: "Please, madame, I am deaf and dumb; Buy my needles; I don't want to beg"! I am afraid that this is hardly an unfair sample of the merits of the street-beggars who thrive on the misplaced tender-heartedness of our ladies.

Another little change which is likely to result from these developments is a different association with the word "Bohemian," which has been a synonym for persons—artists and the like—of erratic dispositions and unconventional habits, but no one's enemies except their own. Recent events would indicate that the term has been strangely misapplied, and that the typical Bohemian is the modern Esau—a rover, to be sure, but a destroyer rather than a creator of art, and one whose hand is against every man and every man's hand against him. Let us hope that a third class among the Bohemians, who are already asserting themselves, will succeed in wiping out the stigma of either suggestion from the name of the race which produced John Huss and Jerome of Prague.

I suppose there is no class more thoroughly "Bohemian," in the old sense of unregulated habits of life, than the rank and file of those who are connected with the secular papers. This is especially true of those who work upon our great dailies. The conditions of their work would conduce to such habits, if there were no natural tendency towards them. Night is turned into day. There can be no forecasting of the time, or the kind, or the pressure, of their engagements. Most of them are on a perpetual voyage of discovery, and life is akin to that of a skirmisher and spy with brief intervals of sleep or of revel around the camp fire. The strain of such a life upon the constitution is such that a sad proportion break down and die young. And the moral strain is equally disastrous. They are largely composed of a singularly brilliant and enterprising class of young men, gifted with just those mercurial and imaginative qualities which can least endure the nervous excitements and the social temptations to which they are exposed.

It was therefore a touching announcement that no less than seventeen of these journalists, who had died poor and friendless, were buried in an uninclosed and unimproved lot in one of our suburban cemeteries. Doubtless the story of those forgotten men, who probably were as bright and busy, as spendthrift and as boon companion, as any of their class, would be as romantic as many a novel. One needs not to be a professional moralist to have his steps arrested and to feel his eyes growing dewy beside these lonely graves. And it was a kind and thoughtful act which has moved many of our citizens to contribute generously to the keeping green of the spot where these, and others who shall be laid beside them, repose.

Another touching memorial is the drinking fountain for man and beast, recently erected in New York to remind the people of Jerry McAuley. The water is kept cool by a central ice chest, and that which is intended for thirsty humanity is held forth in a cup by two hands, projecting from a cross. Upon the cross is the inscription, "I will give unto him that is athirst of the water of life freely." Thus this humble but honored disciple of Jesus still gives his cup of cold water in the name of his Master, and, though dead, still speaks the blessed Gospel which he loved to the weary and the wandering. There are many monuments of noble men and noble deeds in New York, but none are more inspiring in their testimony, alike to the seekers and saviors of the lost and to the lost themselves. Suppose that, instead of water, beer or wine (I will not say, whiskey) flowed from that cup and cross for the refreshment of the people! What would you think of that, my friend who believest that the Lord Jesus Christ, if here to-day, would favor and furnish aqua vitæ as well as the "water of life?"

There are few sights which go to my heart more deeply and tenderly than a procession of veterans, such as filed past my door on Memorial Day. Each year the ranks are thinner, and the men look older and walk more wearily. Nearly all of them are old men now. This makes the war seem far in the past, especially when I put beside it the fact that not half of those who gaze at them know anything of the Great Rebellion except as history. But to me it brings up with painful vividness that long agony, and those bloody battle-scenes and exhausting marches and cruel imprisonments, through which these men went. I seldom close my windows on a wintry or a stormy night without recalling the pang and prayer of sympathy with which I used to close them in those days, and thought of the exposed and unsheltered troops who were freezing and sickening for their country's life. I can never look upon this gray and war-worn remnant without an almost blinding rush of memories and emotions. My eye moistens and my heart thrills, and I have a choking sensation of the throat even now, while I write about it. God bless our veterans, and make them all good soldiers of Jesus Christ, that they may fight the good fight of faith, and lay hold upon eternal life!

Our Church.

General Synod of the Reformed Church in America.

EIGHTIETH REGULAR SESSION, NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., 1886.

Sixth Day—Monday, June 7th.

MORNING, 10.30 O'CLOCK.—The Synod engaged in devotional exercises until 11 o'clock, when Rev. Dr. Drury took the chair and business was resumed. The special order was taken up, which was the hearing of the report of the committee appointed at the last Synod on Sabbath schools and Catechetical Instruction. The Rev. W. H. Ford, Chairman, reported, recommending the following resolutions, which were adopted:

1. That Consistorial reports be accompanied by a blank Sabbath school report, which shall be transmitted by the Stated Clerks of Classes to the Chairman of Synod's Committee.
2. That in order to secure greater unity of method of instruction, the Committee on Sabbath-schools be requested to present to General Synod at its next meeting a system of Lesson Helps which shall be in accord with the doctrinal standards of the Reformed Church in America.
3. That owing to the great and increasing spiritual necessities in this and foreign lands, Synod recognize the importance of instructing the youth on the subject of missions, and, therefore, recommends that at least one session of the Sabbath-schools in each quarter be devoted to the consideration of this subject.

. . . . . .

5. That at the meetings of General Synod one devotional service shall be devoted to prayer and conference on the subject of Sabbath-schools.

The Committee on Necrology reported the death during the year of Rev. Messrs. A. C. Millspaugh, Alexander Watson, J. B. Alliger, John Wenisch, Jefferson Wynkoop, Abraham H. Myers, O. H. Gregory, Theodore B. Romeyn, E. P. Livingston and James B. Wilson.

Report adopted.

AFTERNOON, 2.30 O'CLOCK.—The special order was taken up—the appeal of the Classis of Philadelphia to the General Synod from the action of the Particular Synod of New Brunswick in the case of the appeal of the Third Reformed Church of Philadelphia from certain acts of the Classis of Philadelphia. The case was regularly proceeded with in accordance with the Constitution. The commissioners for the Particular Synod of New Brunswick were Rev. Geo. S. Bishop, D.D., and Rev. J. P. Searle; for the Classis of Philadelphia, Revs. W. B. Voorhees, Wm. R. Taylor and John Hart; for the Third Church of Philadelphia, Mr. G. F. Gordon. Rev. Mr. Taylor opened the case, and was speaking when the hour for adjournment arrived.

EVENING, 7.30 O'CLOCK.—The special order was the hearing of the Report on Foreign Missions and addresses. Rev. Dr. J. B. Drury presided. The attendance by members of the Synod and friends interested in missions was large. The choir of the church sang a suitable anthem; Rev. D. M. Talmage read the Scriptures, and Rev. Theodore S. Brown offered prayer. The report was read by Rev. Wesley R. Davis, D.D., Chairman of the Committee. It opens with fitting reference to the death of Rev. T. B. Romeyn, D.D., a member of the Board, and Gamaliel G. Smith, the Treasurer of the Board since 1862. The health of our missionaries was then referred to—that of Rev. Drs. Talmage, Amerman, and Chamberlain improving. The Amoy Mission was reenforced by the sending out of Rev. Philip W. Pitcher and wife. To this Mission also the Rev. Daniel Rapalje had returned, and Miss H. L. Winn had also returned to her former post in the Ferris Seminary in Japan.

Marked progress has been made. In the Arcot Mission 95 were received on confession, making the number in full communion 1,610; native assistants increased from 150 to 162; eleven more schools established; now 2,213 pupils in Christian schools. The call in India is for advance in every department. Nor is this call less loud, nor the prospect less encouraging in Amoy, where 65 were received on confession, making a total of 784 communicants. A new station will probably soon be opened in the interior, at Sio-ke, some sixty miles west of Amoy. In Japan the first Christian Church organized only 14 years ago by our own missionaries, consisted of 11 members; now the Union Church has 45 churches of over 4,000 members.

The year just closed paid its own way. But the debt of the previous year of $9,000 was not cancelled, and the interest on borrowed moneys had to be added, making a present debt of $10,500. The needs are: for present actual expenses of the missions, $82,000; for re-enforcement now under commission, $5,500; to cancel debt now existing and set the Board free, $10,500; half cost of new house at Tindivanum, $1,600; making a total of expenditures absolutely required for the year, $99,600. The committee then considered the question: How shall this needed sum be raised? From responses to a circular recently sent out by the Secretary, it seems to be the prevailing opinion that the present plan of apportionment, holding conventions, etc., is the best; it is therefore recommended by the committee that it be continued. A cheering feature of the outlook is that so many hitherto non-contributing churches have wheeled into line, and now have a share in the work. There are still 85 churches who contribute nothing, and only 204 out of our 758 Sunday-schools that give to this cause.

The report called the serious attention of the Synod to the fact that nearly one-third of the contributions of the whole year were not received until the last month of the year, or nearly one-half in the last two months of the fiscal year. The great inconvenience to the Board, the necessity of borrowing money and the cost of interest on it, as well as the extreme peril of such a course were clearly presented.

The report says: "The magnificent work done by our Woman's Board calls for the warmest appreciation and heartiest acknowledgment of the Synod. A perusal of their report cannot fail to call forth the most devout thanksgiving to God that He has thus led the mothers and daughters in Israel to spring to the work for which they are so adapted. The fact that they already have 190 Auxiliaries stimulates the hope that ere long there may be one formed in every church of our communion."

The committee recommended the adoption of the following resolutions:

1. That the arrangement in reference to Classical Agents and the apportionment of the amount to be raised for Foreign Missions among the different Classes, recommended by the Synod of last year, be reaffirmed, and that churches be requested to act at once on the basis of the apportionment of last year until the respective Classis shall have modified those apportionments.
2. That each Classis be affectionately and earnestly urged to take such measures as shall secure some contribution, however small, for Foreign Missions from each church and Sunday-school within its bounds.
3. That each Classis, especially those which have country churches, be earnestly requested to so arrange with its churches as that the annual collection for Foreign Missions in a fair proportion of its churches and Sunday-schools be taken during the summer and early autumnal months, and that all churches and Sunday-schools be requested to see that their contributions be forwarded to the Treasurer so soon as collected.
4. That loyalty to the Master and justice to the mission work already in progress require us not only to aim at, but to raise $100,000 for Foreign Missions during the current year, and that each Classical Agent be charged with the duty of striving to bring his Classis up to the full share of that amount.
5. That the Synod render hearty acknowledgment for the efficient service rendered by the Woman's Board and its auxiliaries, and renewedly urges that an auxiliary be formed in every one of our churches.
6. That this Synod urges the increased circulation and perusal of the periodicals of the Board and Woman's Board, and recommend that in addition "occasional papers" in pamphlet form for permanent reference, embodying specific information as to our different mission fields, and different forms of missionary effort, be issued by the Foreign Board and the Woman's Board as they may be able.
7. That a committee of seven, of which the Secretaries of the Foreign Board and Domestic Board, and the Woman's Board and the Woman's Executive Committee of Domestic Missions shall be members, be appointed by this Synod to arrange for a joint Missionary Convention to be held in the autumn with the churches on Long Island, and that this committee be requested to perfect and publish their arrangements for such convention not later than the first of September.
8. That in accordance with the request of the Foreign Board that this Synod unite with other Protestant Christians in this country and Great Britain in setting apart the first Sabbath of November as a day of special united prayer throughout the world for Foreign Missions, this Synod does hereby recommend to all our churches, ministers and church members at home and abroad the observance of the first Sabbath of November, (Nov. 7th), as a day of special prayer in behalf of Foreign Missions; for the extension of the Gospel among unevangelized peoples, and particularly for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon all nations, at this time when so many circumstances seem to favor a rapid advancement of Christ's universal kingdom.

The committee nominated the following ministers and elders to fill vacancies in the Board: Ministers—W. J. R. Taylor, John Forsyth, T. W. Chambers, J. H. Oerter, T. S. Brown. Elders—J. A. Williamson, J. Townsend Lansing, J. L. Sutphen.

While the motion to adopt was pending, the Secretary of the Board, Dr. Cobb, spoke, emphasizing in earnest words several of the most important points and recommendations in the report, especially that relating to the necessity of a more perfect equalization of the gifts of the churches to the Board through the months of the year. The Secretary also referred, in feeling terms, to the late Treasurer, Gamaliel G. Smith, and to his inestimable services.

Dr. Cobb was followed by our missionaries, Rev. J. H. Wyckoff, Rev. E. S. Booth and Dr. Jacob Chamberlain, in short and telling remarks upon some of the practical and essential features of their work, Dr. Chamberlain once or twice firing up the enthusiasm of the Synod to the glowing point of applause.

After the addresses the report was unanimously adopted, and the Synod adjourned.

Seventh Day—Tuesday, June 8th.

Both the morning and afternoon sessions were occupied with the appeal case.

EVENING, 7.30 O'CLOCK.—Rev. Dr. J. B. Drury, President, took the chair and opened the session with prayer. A portion of the Scriptures were read by Rev. W. H. Vroom, and prayer was offered by Rev. C. P. Ditmars. The Committee on Domestic Missions, Rev. Charles Scott, D.D., Chairman, reported. The report was accepted, and its consideration deferred until the special committee, to which was referred the case of ex-Treasurer Smith, shall report.

The report was followed with addresses upon Domestic Missions by the Secretary, Rev. Dr. Jacob West, Rev. S. L. Gamble, of Illinois, and Rev. L. Dykstra, of Dakota.

The Rev. W. J. Leggett, Chairman of the Committee on Synodical Minutes, reported that they had found a number of errors in the footings of the statistical tables, and recommended that the attention of Stated Clerks of Classes, Particular and General Synods, be called to the matter, that more care and greater accuracy might be secured.

The report was adopted.

The Committee on the Disabled Ministers' Fund reported that the permanent fund had been increased $50 by the legacy of Mrs. Janet F. Moffet, making the total sum $53,817.28. There had been received from churches and individuals $2,427.65, the number of churches contributing being 168. The contributions are about $200 in excess of last year; the income, however, has not equalled the expenditures of the year by some $400, which deficiency was made up from the balance on hand at the beginning of the year. In view of these facts the committee submitted the following:

Resolved, That we affectionately urge upon all our pastors and consistories that they give their people an opportunity to contribute to this fund by providing at least for an annual collection in its behalf, and that when such collection is taken they use their best endeavors to show their people that they are asked to bestow, not a gratuity upon persons who have no claim upon them, but a pension upon the faithful soldiers of their own Church, who have become disabled in her service.

Rev. Drs. Good and Van Horne, of the Reformed (German) Church of Philadelphia, were recognized and accorded the privileges of the floor of the Synod.

Eighth Day, Wednesday, June 9th.

MORNING, 9 O'CLOCK.—The Philadelphia appeal case was continued with Rev. Dr. J. B. Drury in the chair. Rev. J. P. Searle, Commissioner for the Particular Synod of New Brunswick, resumed his address, and was followed by Commissioner George S. Bishop, D.D., on the same side. The case occupied the whole day, coming to a conclusion at the evening session, when a vote was taken confirming the judgment of the Particular Synod of New Brunswick,—eighty nine voting for, and thirty-five against.

The Judicial Committee was instructed to formulate the reasons for the Synod's decision. This committee reported the following, which was adopted:

In the matter of the appeal of the Classis of Philadelphia from the Particular Synod of New Brunswick, the General Synod sustains the decision of the Particular Synod. (P. 54, 1886.)

1. Because George F. Gordon, Adrian Van Helder, Reuben Nichols and James Petit are in the regular line of historical succession, the Consistory of the Third Reformed Dutch Church.
2. Because we recognize the church now worshipping at 857 North Broad street, together with all who have been upon the roll of the historical Third Reformed Dutch Church of Philadelphia, and are now in good and regular standing, as the legitimate Third Reformed Dutch Church of Philadelphia.

J. A. DE BAUN,
P. MOERDYKE,
S. L. GAMBLE,
J. LANSING.

The following resolution was then passed:

In sustaining the decision of the Particular Synod of New Brunswick, General Synod desires to say that this action casts no reflection upon the Christian character of Elder D. S. Jones, who seems to have guided his course with conscientious care, according to Pennsylvania law, in guarding the property of the Third Reformed Church.

The Committee on the State of Religion reported through Rev. J. Lansing Pearse. The report was adopted, and is as follows:

Attention is first called to the incompleteness of the statistics of the several Particular Synods, as it is important that reports should be both full and accurate. The aggregate of the statistics is as follows: Classes 34, churches 536, ministers 562, candidates 9, families 46,409, received on confession 4,719, certificate 2,556, losses by dismission, suspension and death 3,690, net gain in membership 3,585; total now in communion 83,037.

Infants baptized 4,608, adults 1,094, catechumens 29,897, Sunday-schools, 769; total enrollment in Sabbath-schools 96,535. Benevolent contributions $231,975 05, an average of $2.79 per communicant; contributed for congregational purposes $859,429.73, an average of $10.35 per communicant; total contributed by the church is $1,091,404,78.

There is an increase in the number of conversions and of those added to our communion from other churches; also, an advance in the work of Sunday-schools and in the department of benevolence. Yet it cannot escape notice that we are making slow progress. The spirit of God has been present in many churches. We must labor to secure His abiding presence till our Church life shall be touched on all sides and the effect shall be manifest in the increase of spiritual life, numbers to our communion, liberality, candidates for the ministry, and of all the interests that are dear to us in our Church. We can rejoice over the fact that the work of the Church is fairly sustained, and that our missionary operations are well supported, but what we want is an advance along the whole line. To this end we must redouble our earnestness in prayer, our activity in work, our liberality in giving.

Ninth Day—Thursday, June 10th.

MORNING, 9 O'CLOCK.—After the formal opening of the session, and the disposal of some details concerning the appeal case, the Synod gave its attention to the special order—the hearing of the report on the Professorate. The committee, Rev. W. J. R. Taylor, D.D., Chairman, reported that they had received the annual report of the Board of Superintendents of the Theological Seminary at New Brunswick, which states that 23 students were in attendance during the year, of whom there were 12 in the Senior class, 6 in the Middle class, and 5 in the Junior class. One of the Middle class died in June, 1885, one of the same class was dismissed to another theological seminary, and two who were absent during 1884 and 1885 returned and completed their studies with the graduates of this year.

The committee recommend that the request of the Board of Superintendents be granted for an extension of the time of its annual meeting, so that the closing exercises of the Institution may be held on Thursday evening, to give time on Wednesday afternoon and evening for the anniversary of the Alumni Association; but that the request of the Association for an annual appropriation of $50 to defray the expenses of its anniversary be declined, the Synod having no funds to be devoted to such uses.

The committee has received the seventeenth annual report of the Standing Committee on the Seminary Grounds and Property, which sets forth that 39 students had resided in Hertzog Hall during the year; that the grounds had been greatly improved; that the museum had, through the efforts of Professor Lansing, had been enriched by valuable accessions of objects of interest from mission fields and other Oriental sources, and that further additions are on their way to this country, including an Egyptian mummy, coins, manuscripts and archæological treasures; also, through Professor De Witt, the American Company of Revisers of the Old Testament have had the use of the room at which they met during the fourteen years of their labors. The Gardner A. Sage Library now contains 37,947 volumes, an increase of 474 volumes within the year.

The committee recommended the reappointment of Elder William H. Kirk for the full term of five years as a member of the Standing Committee, and also that the term of service of Elder William H. Jackson extend until the meeting of the General Synod in 1889.

It was recommended that the committee to procure a fund for the systematic training of students of theology in elocution be continued, and as soon as the means secured will permit, the benefits of the fund be extended to the students of Rutgers College and its Grammar School, and that its administration be confided to the Theological Faculty and the President of Rutgers College.

The committee say: The most serious subject in the report of the Board of Superintendents relates to the small and diminishing number of students preparing for the ministry. The facts are these:

Of the 23 students in attendance last year, 12 have just graduated, leaving but 11 in the two upper classes, six Seniors and five in the Middle class, with no prospect of any additions this year from the college, consequently there will be no Junior class to enter in September, unless students come from other institutions.

The whole number of students having the ministry definitely in view, in the Seminary, College and Grammar School, at the date of the report, was fifty-two. Deducting the graduating class there are now only forty, in all stages of preparation, from academic beginners to the highest class in theology. Of the graduating class in Rutgers College only two have the ministry in view, and these will wait over till another year before entering the Seminary. Besides these, three Juniors, five Sophomores, and four Freshmen, fourteen in all, expect to preach the Gospel; an average of three and a half per year. There are 17 in the Grammar School intending to enter the ministry. We have to face the humiliating fact that of nearly 400 home churches in the Particular Synods of New York, Albany and New Brunswick, six out of seven have not now a single youth preparing for the ministry in our own institutions, in any stage of study, and this for the last nine years, and longer in many cases. Allowing for those who may drop out by sickness, death, and other causes during the ordinary course of preparation, the average annual number of candidates for the ministry now in our institutions is less than five.

The committee refer to the increased advantages and facilities of education in these institutions, and the possible causes of the paucity of students, and the remedy.

The committee proposed the following resolutions:

1. That a pastoral letter be prepared by a committee appointed for the purpose, embracing the facts contained in this report, together with such other matter as shall urgently press this subject upon the heart and conscience of the entire Church.

2. That said pastoral letter be read in every church on the second Sabbath of October, and that the ministers of all our churches be instructed to preach on the subject at the same time.

3. That each member of the Board of Superintendent of the two Theological Seminaries be and hereby is requested, as the agent of the General Synod, to bring this subject to the notice of the Classis which he represents, and to secure its continuous and prayerful attention among the people of the churches.

4. That the Board of Education and its Corresponding Secretary be and hereby are requested to use all the means within their power for the increase of candidates for the ministry, especially in the use of the pulpit and the press, and by addresses to ecclesiastical and other public assemblies and Sunday-schools, and in connection with the Monthly Concert of Prayer for Missions and the Day of Prayer for Colleges.

As a remedy, the importance of the home influence—the Church in the house—was emphasized.

In regard to the Western Theological Seminary, eight students have been under instruction during the year. Rev. D. Van Pelt, who was elected by the last General Synod as Professor of Biblical Languages and Exegesis, having declined, Rev. P. Moerdyke and Rev. H. E. Dosker were reëlected as Lectors for the theological year, who accepted the positions and have efficiently served. With reference to the vacant chair in this Seminary, the committee proposed the following action:

Resolved 1. That while recognizing the desirability of an additional professor in the Western Theological Seminary, this Synod deems it unwise to elect such professor until invested funds sufficient for his support be provided.

2. That until such time the Board of Superintendents of the Western Theological Seminary be and hereby is authorized to appoint one or two Lectors to give instruction in the departments which have been thus supplied during the past year.

3. That a committee of three be appointed, consisting of two members from the West and one from the East, to raise a Permanent Endowment for the chair of Biblical Languages and Exegesis, and also to secure funds to pay the salary of the Lector or Lectors for services rendered by them; and that the monies so raised be paid over to the Board of Direction for the objects named in this resolution.

The committee from the Synod of Chicago shall consist of Rev. Peter Lepeltac and Rev. J. F. Zwemer. From the Eastern Synods, Rev. G. H. Mandeville.

The report was adopted.

AFTERNOON, 2.30.—The report of the Committee on a Critical Edition of the Constitution was taken up, amended and adopted. The essential portions are reserved for publication hereafter.

The Committee on Foreign Missions presented a supplementary report on the following points:

1. In regard to the appeal of the Reformed Dutch Church of Galle, Ceylon, for aid, expressing sympathy with the Church, but declaring that the Board cannot give any aid in the matter, but may act as the channel of gifts from any members of this Church who may desire to help this needy people.

2. Recommending that the request of the Japan Mission to be relieved from the duty of furnishing statistics of churches for publication in the Minutes of Synod, with the statistical tables of the Classes, be granted.

3. Recommending that the Arcot Mission be authorized and requested, so soon as practicable, to set apart one of their number to the specific work of theological instruction and the training of a native ministry. It also calls the attention of those in our churches possessing means to the desirability of promptly raising an endowment of $50,000 for the permanent support of a theological school, and that the Board of Foreign Missions be authorized to take such steps as in their judgment may be best for the carrying out of such project.

4. Heartily approving the stand taken by the Board in their paper on the important subjects of Union and Coöperation in Foreign Missions, of self-support and self-government in the native churches established, and coöperation between Home Boards of different churches, and declaring that the Synod will be prepared to take the necessary legislation to give effect to the views of the Board as occasion shall arise.

The report was signed by all the members of the committee and adopted unanimously.

EVENING, 7 30 O'CLOCK.—The special committee appointed by Synod to take into consideration the report of the Board of Domestic Missions supplementary to the annual report of said Board, and in relation to the fraud committed by Mr. John R. Smith as Treasurer of the Board of Domestic Missions, reported that they had carefully examined the papers referred to them and also made inquiries of the members of the Board of Domestic Missions in relation to the whole matter, and as far as possible, taking into consideration the limited time at its disposal, your committee have possessed themselves of facts known perhaps to many members of Synod, and which in short are substantially the following:

The Board of Domestic Missions have in the past often found it absolutely necessary to borrow money to keep up a proper working of the Board. This position of affairs, to some extent at least, growing out of the fact that the Board makes its payments at specified times, and when the payments fall due in some parts of the year it finds the treasury without the necessary funds to meet them, and resorts to temporary loans. Some years ago and before the Board had its present membership, a resolution was passed authorizing the Treasurer to borrow all monies required by the Board to meet these often repeated deficiencies and debts, and pledging the Board to their payment. It now turns out, upon examination of affairs and Mr. Smith's own statement, that he used this license and power to obtain money which he never charged against himself or credited to the account of the Board, but used for purposes of his own and which are unknown to the Board. Nor has your committee been able to ascertain what application he has made of such moneys. Your committee are informed beyond what the special report of the Board states to Synod, that Mr. Smith's character was good, for as they say, he "had enjoyed the utmost confidence not only of this Board, but of the whole Church and of the community at large." The authority and license he had from the Board to bind them to the payment of notes made by him as Treasurer has involved the Board so that it is now in debt to the amount of about $25,000 in consequence of these acts of Mr. Smith. Nor is this all; the Church is injured in its good name.

This Synod feels humiliated and the cause of the Master is stricken a severe blow at the hand of a professed follower, and we at the first opportunity record our most emphatic detestation and condemnation of these acts of Mr. Smith, and which we emphasize, from the fact, as admitted by himself, that he has pursued his wrong doing and deception for years. These things were not done in some great emergency in his history; but, with time to reflect, he has with a wicked system of duplicity pursued this business, all the while knowing he was doing it because the Board and the Church believed he was an honest man. But "his sins have found him out," and he now finds the truth of the word, "the way of the transgressor is hard."

Being unable to make restitution or even, as he declares, to account for this large sum, Mr. Smith has assigned to the Board life insurance policies amounting to $25,000, most of which, however, are of recent date and all of them together have little or no surrender value. The premiums have been paid by him to the present date, and the Board holds them as the only security it has been able to get; not, however, with any idea of condoning in any respect or degree the crime of the late treasurer.

It is proper that the committee should here state that the accounts show that all moneys paid into the Board by legacy, church, Sunday-school, donation, gift, subscription, or in any other way, have been fully accounted for to the uttermost farthing, and proper vouchers for the payments have been made, and the exactness of the accounts from time to time gave the Board the more confidence in the Treasurer. From the time the Board and its Secretary had reason to believe Mr. Smith had been guilty of wrong-doing, they put it out of his power to further harm the Board or the Church.

To ask the Church at this time, by donation or subscription, to at once pay this indebtedness of the Board, when all the departments of our Church are calling for money and more money to do the work the Church must do, seems to your committee out of the question. And, besides, the time will come when most of this debt can be paid without resorting to this course. Your committee have sought some other way out of the present difficulty and at the same time not to encroach upon specific trust funds. Trust funds, we hold, cannot under any circumstances be diverted. They should not now or ever be used for any purpose other than the one for which they were made. By meeting the annual payments to be made on the life policies (of Mr. J. R. Smith) now belonging to the Domestic Board, and paying the interest on the debt of the Board as stated in their special report, the sum of $1,600 per year will be required. And, moreover, some one who loves our Church and has confidence in its work may yet be disposed in the near future to take an assignment of these policies of insurance and assume the indebtedness, and, until these obligations can be met and thus disposed of, we would request or suggest that the friends of the Church aid in relieving the Board from their embarrassment as much as possible, and further that the Board of Domestic Missions relax no effort to secure from Mr. Smith all indemnity possible in liquidation of the debt.

Resolved, That this Synod authorize and empower the Board of Direction and the Board of Domestic Missions to act conjointly in making arrangements to pay the annual premium on the policies of life insurance assigned to the Board of Domestic Missions by John R Smith, and also to pay the interest on the indebtedness incurred by said Board of Domestic Missions in consequence of the fraud of said Smith. And the Board of Direction are hereby authorized and empowered to use the income of Synod's funds for temporary contingencies so long as it may be necessary for the above purposes, and also to use for the same purpose the income of any other funds in their hands not otherwise appropriated.

Resolved, That we recommend that Ernest J. Miller and Henry D. Van Orden be added to the Committee on Church Loans.

After much animated discussion the report was adopted, with the following, offered by Rev. Ralph Brokaw:

Resolved, That the time has come when, with so frequent betrayals of financial trust, such wretched crimes as this of John R. Smith should not be condoned.

Resolved, That the Board of Domestic Missions has the support of General Synod in its most vigorous pressing of this case.

The report of the Committee on Domestic Missions, Rev. Charles Scott, D.D., Chairman, presented on Tuesday evening, was taken up for consideration. The committee reported that the Board had been afflicted in the prostration by sickness of Rev. Abraham Thompson, a member of the Executive Committee, and the Vice-President, Rev. P. D. Van Cleef, D.D., and in the death of two of its most valued missionaries, Rev. A. C. Millspaugh and Rev. E. P. Livingston. Judge Theodore R. Westbrook, LL.D., an influential member of the Board, has also died during the year.

The receipts of the Board for 1885-86 were $35,998.41, expenditures $30,037.68, leaving a balance of $5,960.73. The Church Building Fund began the year with a debt of $9,770.85, received for the year $13,050.13, expended $8,238 88, leaving a balance of $4,811.25, reducing the debt to $4,959.60. There had been aided, missionaries, 92, and 109 stations having families, 4,979; communicants, 6,910; received on confession during the year, 667; by certificate, 411; and Sabbath-schools, 95, with scholars, 10,635, among whom were conversions, 117; new organizations, 11; all at the West except two—one at Ocean Hill, in Brooklyn, and another at Cobleskill, Schoharie County, N. Y. For the first time there has been about equal work done in the West and in the East; the number of stations and families being very nearly the same.

The General Synod last year directed the appointment of a Missionary Superintendent, for which office the Rev. James F. Zwemer was nominated. The report of the Board says: "The utmost courage hesitated to incur one more liability under the circumstances." Considering the fact of a balance in hand of $4,960.73, the failure to follow the direction of Synod does not seem to the committee to be justified.

The Treasurer's report reveals the fact that a debt of $25,750.94 has been created through the fraud of Mr. John R. Smith, Treasurer of the Board. It seems strange that notes to so large an amount should have been fraudulently issued without detection; and the want of ordinary precaution on the part of the Secretary or the Executive Committee is implied therein. This whole matter, however, has been referred to a special committee, which will undoubtedly recommend suitable action to the Synod.

The Woman's Executive Committee shows gratifying success in every branch of the work. Additional auxiliaries were organized in the Particular Synods. The Treasurer reports that $6,312.47 have been received from this source.

A convention in behalf of Missions, both Foreign and Domestic, was held during the year at Fonda, N. Y., attended by a delegation of 78 ministers, 22 elders and 29 ladies, and large audiences. This conference memorializes General Synod as follows:

Resolved, That a memorial be sent to General Synod from this Conference, requesting that it instruct its Board of Domestic Missions to deny all appropriations of funds for the establishment of Reformed churches in new fields fairly preoccupied by evangelical denominations; and that this action be commended to other evangelical denominations, asking the same courtesy at their hands.

The committee recommended the following resolutions:

1. That we are much gratified with the results of the last year in the operations of this Board; in the increase to its funds, and the general advance made in its work. The churches are cheered by progress.

2. That the recommendation of the last General Synod be repeated, viz., that the amount of $40,000 be raised for Domestic Missions, and of $20,000 for the Church Building Fund. The Classes and congregations are hereby urged to labor on until the above needed sum be secured.

3. That the Board be directed to comply, so far as may be practicable, with the principle of the memorial from the Fonda Conference, and that it open a correspondence with the Home Mission Committees of other evangelical denominations in order to secure from them the observance of a similar courtesy, reporting the result to the next General Synod.

4. That the Board, in some measure, should change its rules of procedure and business, holding more frequent meetings, and requiring that appropriations and financial operations of the Executive Committee should, so far as is practicable, be submitted to its approval before any final action.

5. That the Board be requested hereafter to accompany its annual report with an itemized statement of receipts and expenditures for the year.

The report was adopted.

The following supplementary resolution was offered by Elder R. N. Perlee and adopted:

Resolved, That all notes which the Boards of this Synod shall authorize to be given for any purpose shall be countersigned by the President or Vice-President or Secretary, and such authorization shall be entered upon the minutes at the meeting of the Board or its Executive Committee, and recorded in the "Bills Payable Book," from which book a quarterly report shall be made both by the Treasurer and the Secretary. And the said book shall be submitted with the accounts of the Treasurer, and all the books requisite for the examination by the Auditing Committee.

The Revised Version.

MR. EDITOR: The Report of the General Synod's Committee on the Revised English Bible is very judicious, as was to be expected from the character of the men who composed it. Yet there is a paragraph in the report that seems to me liable to misapprehension. I wish therefore to say a word.

1. While "it is possible that the convocation may refer the work back to the Revisers for modification or for a final standard edition," there is good reasons to believe that not one of the British Committee, and only one of the American Committee, expects such a thing to occur.

2. The American Committee continues its organization, but this is not because of "any important unadjusted differences" between it and the British Committee. I know of none such.

3. The American Old Testament Company are indeed "perfecting their appendix." But this does not mean that they are revising their previous work, much less that they are making any new changes, but only that they are making the printed appendix an accurate expression of the conclusions arrived at before the book was printed, that is, correcting any errors which may accidentally have been made. These corrections when completed will be sent to the University Presses, just in the same way and for the same reasons that corrections of typographical errors would be sent.

4. I add that the Revised English Bible is un fait accompli. It may be accepted or rejected; but, so far as I can learn, neither they who ordered it nor they who made it will ever touch their hands to it anew. It stands or falls as it is.

[A CORRECTION.—In the necessarily rapid copying of the report of the Committee the word "Universities" was inadvertently substituted for the "University Presses." The Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, as such, have nothing to do with the Revision.—ED]

....HARLEM, N. Y.—The call extended by the Consistory of the Reformed Church to the Rev. Joachim Elmendorf, D.D., of Poughkeepsie, has been accepted. In a few months Dr. Elmendorf is expected to enter upon his duties as pastor of "Old Harlem Dutch Church," to which he comes by the unanimous choice of its congregation.

Good progress is being made on the new church now in course of erection; as advance is made toward completion its architectural beauties are brought out more prominently, and give promise of this church building becoming on completion an ornament to West Harlem. The Rev. Geo. H. Smyth, the pastor of the old church, will minister to the congregation of the new church. Few fields so long open for successful denominational advance have been more neglected than this in the past; yet few, if any, evince a more spirited revival of determination to embrace opportunities offered in the present.

Nisi Dominus Frustra. W.

... THE PASTORS' ASSOCIATION.—At the meeting, June 7th, the Rev. E J. Runk read, by request, a paper on "Vacant Pulpits and Unemployed Ministers," which excited general and interesting discussion. At the meeting of June 14th reminiscences of the General Synod were indulged in, chiefly by Rev. Drs. Oerter, Suydam, A. J. Hutton, and Vermilye, the discussion turning upon the statistical tables and the treatment of non-resident church members dropped from the roll. The Rev. E. J. Runk was re-elected President, and the Rev. A. H. Demarest was chosen Secretary for three months. Next Monday the Rev. H. C. Berg will read a paper on the subject, "Is Ordination Necessary to the Constitution of a Minister?"

....PATERSON, N. J.—The Broadway Reformed Church, Rev. N. H. Van Arsdale, pastor, raised last year toward reducing the debt on their new church building over $3,000, and at the same time kept up to their usual standard their contributions to benevolent purposes.

Last Sunday evening the church was crowded with an audience deeply interested in the anniversary exercises of the Sabbath-school. The church was not elaborately, but very tastily trimmed with palms, smilax, daisies and cut flowers. The singing, led by the excellent choir, was entered into heartily by the school and greatly enjoyed by the congregation. Thirteen pupils have joined the church on confession during the year. A young people's Sunday evening prayer meeting, conducted by the youth of the church, is largely attended. The school is growing, the average attendance being larger than in former years. A large number of new books have been recently added to the library. Liberal contributions have been made for benevolence and for school purposes. The collection on Sunday evening for the further work of more conveniently fitting up the schoolroom amounted to over $50. The Young People's Lyceum reported $847 in hand for a new organ for the church.

...REV. A. E. KITTREDGE, D.D.—The congregation of the Third Presbyterian Church of Chicago, in relation to the departure of Dr. Kittredge, held a special meeting and unanimously adopted a paper prepared by the session. The minute adopted in October, 1884, is repeated, and to it are added these weighty sentences:

Sixteen years of uninterrupted labor by Dr. Kittredge, marred by not even the semblance of a quarrel or schism of any kind, have resulted in raising this weak, struggling church of less than three hundred members, and with even less facilities than that possessed by other churches here and elsewhere, to a membership of over two thousand three hundred, and a position of strength and usefulness surpassed by only one church in our denomination in this country. Unity, peace, and concord without interruption have crowned Dr. Kittredge's labors here from the first. What his daily life among us is, we have already said. In the pulpit he holds a place second to no preacher in this country for unvarying freshness, skill, and power in presentation of the Gospel. Leading the weekly prayer-meeting he has no peer. The results of these sixteen years' labor are more expressive than any eulogy that can be placed on paper, and will be more enduring. It is quite common when a separation occurs between pastor and congregation for outside parties to allege causes other than those given the public by the parties immediately interested, and frequently they exist; but even lying lips would be dumb for anything to make such allegation here. No skeleton can be found in the closets of this church to controvert these recitals.

Dr. Kittredge is in healthy middle life; his mental and physical strength and energy is in no sense impaired; but as above stated, there are warnings which ought not to be disregarded that he cannot continue to carry the burdens imposed upon him here, which increase yearly, without risking the impairing of his vocal organs to such a degree as to impair his usefulness; and solely because he has been advised by skilful physicians that such a change of labor as is indicated in this call will almost surely tend to remove these grave apprehensions and save him to the Church and usefulness, he goes from us, and we but manifest our love in consenting and bidding him God-speed. He goes with the love of every member of this congregation, and we can only look to Him who gave him to us to supply his place. He will stand in a new pulpit and speak the words of life to a new congregation, will minister to them in their sorrow and share their joys, bringing freshness and new life to their homes, but for all that we only loan him to them. Dr. Kittredge belongs to the Third Church and Chicago.

....THE ST. JOHN'S GERMAN REFORMED SUNDAY-SCHOOL, BERGEN, N. J., celebrated, Sunday, June 6th, its third anniversary. The exercises consisted of singing, reading of reports, and addresses by the pastor, Rev. G. Andraea, and Mr. R. R. Green. A gracious providence has smiled upon the school, so that its ranks are larger and its finances better than a year ago, promising a prosperous future. One of the pleasant features of the occasion was the singing by the choir of children which form the choir of the church.

...PERSONALS.—Rev. J. E. Crane, pastor of the church at Rocky Hill, N. J., has been relieved from the second preaching service until the first Sabbath in September, by vote of the consistory ...The churches at Manheim, N. Y., and Sprakers, N. Y., are to be supplied during the summer by theological students; the former by W. H. Boocock, the latter by John A. Thompson....Rev. R. H. Joldersma was installed as pastor of the Fifth Reformed Church Grand Rapids, Mich., June 2d, the services being conducted by Revs. E. Winter, J. Van der Meulen and N. H. Duker.... The Rev. W. H. De Hart expects to sail on Saturday for a vacation in Holland with Rev. D. Van Pelt, D. J. W. Beardslee and Rev. P. Moerdyke, jr. on 1st Saturday.

Gleanings from our Exchanges.

....The Trinity Reformed Church, Plainfield, N. J., Rev. A. V. V. Raymond, pastor, had an addition of thirty members Sunday, June 6th.

....The Rev. Elbert Nevius, who has been pastor of the church at Stuyvesant, N. Y., for forty years, sent in his resignation to take effect October 1st.

....The funeral of Lennie Tremain, the lad who was drowned at Ghent, N. Y., alluded to in last week's "Synodical Notes," took place on Friday, June 4th. The services were conducted by his pastor, Rev. J. B. Drury, D.D., assisted by Rev. Mr. Hartman. A large congregation gathered to show their sympathy for the afflicted parents and friends. There were many flowers, and among them a pillow, with the words "Our Boy" prettily lettered. The bank of flowers given by his class and their teacher was placed on his grave. The Sunday-school class of which he was a member wore badges of mourning and accompanied the friends to the burial place at Spencertown, N. Y.

....The fiftieth anniversary of the Sabbath-school of the Second Church of Somerville, N. J., was celebrated the last Sunday in May. The sermon in the morning was preached by the Rev. Dr. T. W. Chambers. The anniversary exercises, proper, took place in the afternoon, when the chief addresses were by the superintendent of the school, Hon. L. A. Thompson, and several ex-superintendents. There was a praise service in the evening. The attendance at all the services was very large and the singing and addresses excellent. The total enrollment of the school is 371; the average attendance 187.

Mrs. Loring's Discipline.

BY MARY E. BRUSH.

CHAPTER I.

THE clock ticked loudly, its monotonous notes sounding strangely clear as they broke the mid night silence of the little room. Even the room itself seemed unfamiliar, with its bare floors and walls and the two curtainless windows, staring like huge uncanny eyes. The comfortable sofa with its sleep-inviting cushions was in the hall outside; the cheery, red carpet lay in a mummy-like roll beside it; the bookcases were there, too, and the chairs and tables and all the little odds and ends that serve to make an apartment inhabitable, were also packed away, awaiting the auctioneer's wagon. Even the crimson plush drapery about the mantel had been torn down and the white marble was left staring with the solemn, imperturbable countenance of a tomb stone.

The utter dreariness was brightened a little by the fire glowing on the hearth, the scarlet, leaping, twisting flames, the pleasant sizzle of sap and the crack ling of the mossy bark,—all these had a sound of good cheer.

But besides the noise of the fire and the clock's ticking, could be heard from a little white cot in the corner the low, regular breathing of two wee sleepers, —Ray and Baby Bell.

Thank God, she was not quite alone! Mrs. Loring thought amid a gush of tears. Yet only a few weeks ago and one other had been with her! One ever strong and tender,—her husband. But now he was gone, gone forever!

Not so very long before our little story begins, dear reader, perhaps you may have seen in some of our daily papers a notice of how, on a certain day, a staunch ship sailed from the harbor of one of our large eastern cities, sailed away in the bright autumnal sunshine, but was never heard of again. And as you read, you felt a sudden sympathetic thrill for the lost ones and those left mourning behind; but the feeling soon passed away in the all-absorbing joys and sorrows of your own life.

But to Mrs. Loring that little newspaper notice seemed written in words of flame that seared and scared her very being! Her husband was aboard that ill-fated vessel. And now she was a widow indeed—a widow with no grave to watch and weep over or lead her children to as to a hallowed shrine, —nothing but the great, gray sea whose hungry, hollow moans found an echo in her aching heart.

She had always lived in sunshine, had this heroine of mine. Petted by her parents, beloved by friends and idolized by her husband, little wonder that when the shadow came she found its darkness appalling. But she could not sit down and nurse her grief. Close upon the heels of the first great shock came the stern revelation that she was not only a widow, but also a poor one.

It is a painful fact that, in this world of ours, there are those who will take advantage of ignorance and helplessness, and, in her attempt to settle her husband's affairs, Mrs. Loring found, that while creditors were plenty, debtors were few. Yet in her pain and bewilderment one thing was plain,—her husband's good name must be preserved, and so every claim, just or unjust, was paid, and when this was done she found that she had but little left.

Her parents were long since dead. Friends, like summer birds, deserted her. A few calls were paid; a few notes of condolence sent her, that was all,—the world spun on in its old giddy fashion. In the days of her prosperity, she had been a welcome guest at social gatherings. Many were those who had partaken of the hospitality of her little home. Now all was different. No one offered to lend a helping hand. It is to be regretted that in this hour of trial, Ruth Loring had not the consolation of religion. Not that she was an unbeliever, her indifference to the subject was partly owing to her early training. Of course, like many other respectable persons, she was in the habit of attending church. Not regularly, however, nor at a stated place. She went where there was the attraction of good music and brilliant preaching. But she had never joined any of God's people. To tell the truth, she had never seriously thought much concerning the subject. Her thoughts had ever been self-centred. She had made home pleasant for her family. She had been an ornament to society. But all that is truly grand and self-denying, all that molds and expands one's character and ennobles the soul, was lying latent in her nature—needing but the crucible of pain and adversity to purify and make active.

This is her condition when we first present her to our readers. The clock still ticked monotonously, the fire snapped and crackled, and mingled with these sounds came, now and then the gentle breathing of the sleeping children. It was this last sound that aroused the mother from her mournful gazing into the dancing flames.

"My children!" she murmured with a smile that was like sunshine mingled with rain. She reached her hand into her pocket and drew forth a square, white envelope. The handwriting on the scented sheet within was after the fashionably angular style then prevalent, and the words ran as follows:

"MRS. RUTH LORING: Madam—I have seen in the papers that my nephew, your husband, was lost on the 'Orion.' I have learned from another source that you are left in rather straightened circumstances. If this be the case, you will probably have no objections towards favorably considering a proposition which I now make to you. Although my nephew estranged me from him in paying no heed to my objections to what you will excuse me for terming a most unfortunate marriage, I still entertain a natural affection to those of his own blood whom he has left behind. Give me, then, his children and I will provide for all their wants and at my death they shall be my heirs, that is, of course, if they prove worthy. I will do this on one condition; that you give me the legal and absolute control over them and afterwards have no communication whatever with them, unless with my permission? In return for this, I will agree to give you an annuity of five hundred dollars per year, which, with careful management and a little healthful exertion on your part, will support you most comfortably.

"If you conclude to accept my offer, and you cannot fail of perceiving the advisibility of so doing, you will please bring the children to me at once. Or, better still, if you notify me of the place and date, I will send on my maid, an elderly and most reliable Scotchwoman, to come and get them. Pray let me know your decision as speedily as possible.

Respectfully, ISABEL THORNTON."

Again and again Mrs. Loring read the lines. The words seemed as hard and sharp as a steel knife! Not a touch of womanly gentleness, not a sign of human sympathy! And yet the writer had once been as a fond faithful mother to Guy, her husband. Mr. Loring, having been left an orphan at a very early age, was, together with a fair young sister, carefully reared by this same Aunt Isabel; but, as the old lady had often bitterly thought, her reward had been feeble. Ethel, her niece, had died just on the threshold of budding womanhood. Guy, in a moment of foolish infatuation, as she termed it, had bound himself to a girl who was a penniless stranger.

Miss Isabel Thornton was proud and obstinate. She would listen to no plea in favor of the pretty charmer. She refused to see her even, and sternly forbade Guy's bringing home his bride. And so a great gulf was fixed between those who had been as mother and son. Doubtless Miss Isabel suffered more than her nephew, for she was old and alone. The young pair were absorbed in each other and the two little ones the fast-flying years brought them. But, as we have said, Miss Isabel was proud and obstinate. She gave no sign of grief. She expressed no desire for reconciliation. Only now, that Death, the great Divider, had come, had she broken the long silence.

"It is insulting!" exclaimed Ruth, convulsively, crushing the paper in her small hands. "She offers to buy my children—my children whose father she disowned and whose mother she has treated with contempt! No, she shall never, never have them!"

Then, like the heavy touch of cold iron, came the question of hard, practical sense; how could she, Ruth Loring, delicate in health, poor in purse and ignorant of ways and means, feed, clothe, and educate her little ones? What work could she do? With what weapon could she drive away the grim wolf poverty? Her early training had been superficial, so far as anything practical was concerned. She knew something of books; could play a little and sing some ballads sweetly; she could crochet, embroider, but nothing well enough to be a means of gaining a livelihood.

But as she sat and wept in her anxiety there came to her the thought of One who is ever the God of the widowed and fatherless. He would somehow provide a way.

"I will trust Him!" exclaimed the little mother, as she bent over the couch of her sleeping children. And as they lay there in their innocent slumber the sight was enough to nerve any mother to action and endurance,—Ray, with his curling, black lashes veiling his round, rosy cheek, and his chubby, tanned hands clasping his sister's neck; the little sister with fair, delicate features and sunny curls.

"They are mine!" murmured Ruth Loring. "God gave them to me—for me to love and work for and rear to His glory! He will somehow help me to do my duty."

Glances Across the Sea.

BY REV. HENRY E. DOSKER.

III.

A FEW weeks elapsed. The country looked breathlessly on. The days of Voet and Cocceius seemed well-nigh returned. The struggle at Amsterdam was the sole topic of conversation. Even the House felt its subtle influence. At home and abroad the question was on every lip, "What will Synod do?' The answer came and was vastly disappointing. The lords of the Church, at the Hague, had carefully weighed the matter and decided not to be used as a cat's paw for the Classis of Amsterdam.

Synod resolved March 11th, 1886, Dr. J. Koch presiding, that the Provincial Synod of North Holland had brought the case of the provisionally suspended members of the Consistory of Amsterdam to its jurisdiction without sufficient warrant, and therefore referred all the papers "in casu" back to Classis, in order that said body might render a decision, which should be ratified by the Provincial Synod.

The gentlemen of Synod smiled gracefully; the Classis of Amsterdam was placed in a sad predicament. Consistory and Classis, accuser and judge, it found itself utterly bemuddled in its strange duality of character, and caught in the trap it had set for others.

Three months have elapsed and nothing has been done; nearly six months have passed since the suspension and things are where they were on that fatal January the 4th. As papers come in from across the sea we look, but in vain, week by week for the much desired decision.

Meanwhile the ball kept rolling. Conferences were held within the bounds of the Classes of Amsterdam, Rotterdam, Dokkum, Sneek, Harderwyk, Heusden, Driebergen, etc., etc.; all of which gave their unconditional support to the suffering brethren of Amsterdam, where the Classis, in its blind folly, had welded another link of the chain of illegalities.

On April 3–4, it had once more assumed consistorial authority, and appointed new members of the Board of Trustees against all the express regulations of law and the charter of the Church of Amsterdam.

Vigorous protests were immediately handed in.

It is a patent fact that, should the matter ever reach the civil courts, not a judge in the land will or can recognize the authority of the Board as thus constituted.

The mass of the congregation of Amsterdam attend the ministrations of the suspended ministers in various halls in the city, and the churches are comparatively empty.

Some open ruptures have occurred. In three distinct cases at least, churches have broken with the authority of Synod. Dr. Kuyper, while not directly advising such steps, yet clearly establishes the right of individual corporations in every movement of the kind. He says, February 21st, 1886: "It must be well understood that these churches did not secede, but that they cut off the Synodical judicatories. Every church has a vested right to change its Constitution, as was shown in 1570, when the Reformed Churches freely adopted a 'kerkenorde,' and in 1816, when they freely changed it. If allowable at those times, it is so now."

The cases of open rupture are those of Kootwyh, Voorthuizen and Reitsum. That of Kootwyh is somewhat involved. It is an obscure, little place, whose church had been vacant for at least a generation. Mr. J. H. Houtzagers was the first graduate for the ministry of the Free University of Amsterdam. But the law did not allow any candidate, except the graduates of the State Universities. Synod even, under pressure, refused to change this law. Kootwyh desired the ministrations of this man, Houtzagers, and its people would not be dissuaded.

He was therefore examined November 20th, 1885, by a committee of various neighboring churches, and by them he was admitted to the ministry. A strange proceeding, but correct according to the original "Kerkenorde." He was ordained and installed by Rev. J. van Lingen, a member of the Classis of Arnhem. The church was, on that occasion, so crowded that a Classical committee, which came "with armed violence" to prohibit the proceedings, could not effect an entrance.

The Classis immediately took the matter in hand. Rev. v Lingen received a mild "admonition" for the part he had taken. Rev. Houtzagers and the entire consistory of Kootwyh were instanter suspended by Classis, and with the uttermost dispatch deposed from their respective offices and expelled from the communion of the Church by the General Synod of the Hague, Feb. 18th, 1886.

Meanwhile, the entire congregation had, a few days before, withdrawn from the authority of General Synod, by an address to his majesty the king, in the usual vein.

In vain did the Classis of Arnhem seek to obtain a workable minority at Kootwyh. Its people seem united and things go on peaceably.

Amsterdam and Kootwyh! What a difference of Synodical attitude! You see, a man who dares not tackle a bull-terrier, will often exhibit his prowess on a lap dog.

The church of Voorthuizen had done the very same thing under the able leadership of Dr. W. Vanden Bergh, whose addresses to the king, and to the church at large, breathe a noble spirit of deep piety and profound assurance of the legality of the steps they are taking.

Synod wisely let him alone.

Reitsum, led by its well-known pastor, Rev. J. J. Ploos Van Amstel, followed suit; many other churches are waiting and watching.

The so-called "ring," consisting of the pastors of Classis who supply vacant churches, desired, as usual, that the salaries of these fields, now considered vacant, be paid to them for supplies. But the Minister of Finances, looking at the matter with a purely secular eye, wisely concluded to retain the money till the pending questions be settled.

All this while the Synod had been pelted from all quarters with requests for the immediate establishment of an Interim, whereby all the factions in the Church should be suitably provided for, pending the settlement of existing troubles.

Some desired that the process against the Amsterdam Consistory be first finished.

But late in March Synod resolved, with 17 against 2 votes, to immediately proceed with the consideration of a modus vivendi.

Again great expectancy!

Once more a sad failure!

Well did Dr. Kuyper say of it, May 2d: "This so-called modus vivendi is evidently nothing but a contract between the Moderns and the Groningers to remove some difficulties for the mutual benefit of their own partisans, without any recognition whatever of the Orthodox and against the will of the Trenicals. Thus the modus vivendi is a still-born infant."

It appears to me, from this proposal, that Synod took the words in their literal sense, and devised a way of prolonging and providing for the life of the unbelievers in the Church. Dr. Kuyper proposes that three Moderns, three Groningers, three Trenicals and three Orthodox meet somewhere to devise a radical scheme for the solution of this trouble. The various Classes could then choose between the Synodical and the private scheme, and in a few months order and rest could be restored.

We will wait and see.

It is a pity that Dr. Kuyper, who intended to visit this country this summer, is prohibited from so doing by the press of occurrences at home. From him, better than from any other man, we might glean a true conception of the outlook of orthodoxy in the Church of the fathers.

How to Reach the Masses.

BY REV. P. E. KIPP.

IN one word—by reaching the children. Get hold and keep hold of those who will otherwise form the churchless masses in ten or fifteen years from now. Rightly used, the Sabbath-school is the church's most powerful auxiliary; but wrongly used it becomes the church's most powerful antagonist.

I charge upon the mismanaged Sabbath-school the responsibility for the depleted churches which we now so deeply deplore. It has educated the present generation away from the church by tolerating the practical heresy that church neglect was a venial sin, while Sabbath-school neglect was a mortal sin. Prizes were offered for Sabbath-school attendance; none for church attendance. Picnics, entertainments and festivals were provided to increase Sabbath-school organization; none to develop church organization.

What has been the result? What must be the logical and expected result? Very soon the scholars feel that they have outgrown the school and they cease to attend there; but they have never been educated to attend the church, and they go nowhere.

Those scholars who have been converted during youth, attend and support the church; and even they have their sense of its importance weakened by the loose ideas they have unconsciously imbibed concerning it; while the unconverted young men and women retire from the one and fail to attend the other, especially after marriage; so the opportunity for conversion for the most is limited to childhood.

Through the Sabbath-school Providence has given this century a hold upon nearly all the children; by a careless education we let them slip, and then make great effort to win them back.

Instead of vigorously insisting upon church attendance and so binding them by persistent and strong habit, we are content with school attendance; happy if we can for a while fasten them to the human and temporary, instead of riveting them to the permanent and divine.

In their youth we have had the masses under our influence; by our own neglect we have not made them church-goers. When they have left the school, and in manhood remain what in their youth we have made them, then we wring our hands and cry, "How shall we reach and reclaim the masses?"

We once had them; by our own carelessness they have escaped us; now we wrack our brains for new expedients to get them back.

And the greater pity is, that while we are trying to repair our mistake, our thought is so occupied that we are still continuing the mistake; while we are chasing after the unsheltered sheep, we are again letting the lambs run off from the fold, and so are preparing for the next generation the very trouble that the last generation transmitted to us.

How shall we make the masses church-goers? Make the children church-goers, and in fifteen years we shall have no churchless masses to worry us.

An ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure. You can do very little for a race of topers, but you can head off the next generation of drunkards by making the children total abstainers.

While you have them, fasten them; much better that than to turn the colts loose, and when they have grown wild, then try to catch them.

Teach the children that the Church which Christ Himself founded is of the first importance; the Sabbath-school, good as it is, is only a modern invention.

If you will offer rewards, offer them for church attendance rather than for the school attendance. Value most the formation of those habits which are to control them when they are beyond the leading strings of teachers and parents.

What will make most for their manhood and womanhood is to be cultivated more sedulously than what is adapted to transient childhood and youth. The masses who have reached mature life are not found in the Sabbath-school, and few of them ever will be. Be sure to wind about the children strands that thicken into stout cables, which will be all that can hold them when the other cords are cut.

Make the children church-goers, and you will have no reason to complain of the masses of men and women as non church-goers.

Boston Letter.

JUNE 9th, 1886.

PHILLIPS BROOKS does not care to be Assistant Bishop of Pennsylvania. He feels that his work is here, and he is right. One of the Boston dailies gives him the title, Bishop of New England. If there were a vacancy in the bishopric of the Massachusetts diocese of his Church, he would be Bishop Paddock's successor. His situation in the ecclesiastical world is peculiar. He is heartily attached to his own Church, and hopes it may become the representative Church of Christendom. In turn he is honored by it, elected to the Standing Committee of his diocese, and chosen as a deputy to the coming General Convention. The diocese of Pennsylvania clamors for him, but the diocese of Massachusetts will not part with him. While loyal to his own Church, he believes in the Church Universal, and is very much loved by Congregationalists and members of other evangelical denominations. Also, on the other hand, there are many who, trained as Unitarians, have been gathered within the noble walls of Trinity, to say reverently each Lord's day, "I believe in Jesus Christ, His Son, our Lord."

Trinity is very low-church in its methods. It has no vested choir. Its rector does not bow in the creed. Its communion table is a table. It is not set against the wall, but in the old English fashion stands out in the great chancel, and at its long rail, sweeping about the table, bow a great throng of communicants. It has been already noticed in the INTELLIGENCER that Phillips Brooks has been lately chosen as one of the preachers at Harvard under the new regime of college worship.

The late anniversary week did not arouse special interest. Unitarians and Universalists still rally at Boston, but the Congregationalists have been gradually forsaking anniversary week. Once, what a Pilgrim rush there was for Boston, anniversary week. What long files of carpet-bags, umbrellas and spectacles moved on the northeastern metropolis, rallying from Passamaquoddy to Lake Champlain, and from the White Hills down to Sandy Hook. Their voices could be heard echoing in ringing Anglo-Saxon from the platform of Tremont Temple, or heard in the sweet songs of Zion within the walls of "Park street" or "Mount Vernon." Now the interest in those meetings is transferred to the great anniversaries of the American Missionary Association or the Home Missionary Society at Saratoga and elsewhere, while for many years the American Board has been a mighty traveller all over the North. It means that the denominations are making more and more of their own separate council-fires, also that Congregationalism has so grown that Boston is no longer the centre of its population, but it must be found elsewhere. While Unitarians are still found on that old camping-ground of anniversary week, they are shifting a portion of their interest to the Saratoga meetings. Unitarianism, too, is ceasing to be a Massachusetts heresy, and in its westward movement has lost its provincial shibboleths.

Boston has felt the agitation of the big strike-wave rocking the land, and it has hindered very much movements in the building world. More serious than the harm to any particular business was the wound given to public confidence, on which all prosperity in business is based. When that is hurt, money goes back to its hiding-place in bank vaults, in private safes and long woollen stockings, like the head of a turtle darting within its shell when a boy shies a stone at it. We all desire to see labor better remunerated, but the late strike was both ill-timed and extravagant. I can imagine that its consequences will reach into next winter and give a still sharper sting to the winter blasts. Business in Boston a few months since had a cheery outlook. The strike, though, hung something like a pall over certain sections of the business world. The baker, the plumber, the mason, the carpenter, the tailor, the spinner, the weaver, and I don't know whom else, asked, like Oliver Twist, for "more." How would it do for ministers to go on a strike?

There has been an increased attention paid to Memorial Day services here in New England. At one such occasion that I attended in New Hampshire I was surprised to see the interest manifested. It was a small country town pitched by the fathers of the commonwealth in the seventeenth century along the tumbling Atlantic. People came in barges, in picnic teams, in carry-alls, in chaises, in the old farm-wagon. In dense masses they grouped around the Town Hall that could not contain them, standing in rows, squatting on the grass, or sitting in their carriages, listening attentively to the orator in the band-stand shouting himself hoarse. Utterances on such occasions broaden into something more than memories of the past or reflections upon it. They greaten into the discussion of topics of present national interest. Geo. M. Cable's words at Northhampton upon the South attracted much attention.

War, war, in some form, is man's destiny. Here is a subject demanding notice from those interested in reforms; I mean the use of opium. Reference was made to it in a late number of the INTELLIGENCER, and on the heels of that remark comes a newspaper report of a raid made the other day on an opium den run under Chinese auspices in the very classic city of Cambridge. Agencies and agents were captured, including a female hireling whose vocation was that of filling the pipes. Vile business! Those familiar with the current literature of a period when many readers of the INTELLIGENCER were children, will remember the interest excited by De Quincey's "Confessions of an Opium-Eater."

One can never think of De Quincey without recalling the drug that degraded him and the book that helped give him fame. We may picture him as a man of saturnine countenance, with dark, gloomy eyes under bushy, overhanging brows, eyes occasionally lighting up with the flashes of an unhealthy narcotic excitement, and then dulling till they become the most sombre of caves. How different, though, is this description which I find of him: "A short and

....“POETRY AS A REPRESENTATIVE ART,” by Professor George L. Raymond, of Princeton College, is a remarkable work, alike for the completeness with which a very comprehensive subject is treated, and for an acuteness and originality which opens up new relations and applications, that render the scope of the subject still more extensive. The technique of versification, the rhetoric of poetical composition, and even the mutual bearing of the two, have received no lack of attention; but we know of no book to be compared with this in bringing the whole into unity as distinctively a “representative art.” There is a full and satisfactory discussion of the points connected with language and versification, as a vehicle for the conveyance of poetic ideas and emotions. The analysis of language as a representation of thought by sounds, and of elocution as the interperter of sounds, is clear, thorough, and convincing. We would call especial attention to Prof. Raymond s distinction between the instinctive and reflective origin of words, and to the additional quality which he designates as emotive. Hence he builds up the distinction between the expression of thought in conventional and in poetical words and phrases. We cannot follow him through the examination of the latter subject,—the poetic language. But we can promise the reader that he will find it luminous and interesting. These qualities are largely secured by the copious use of extracts and illustrations, giving the book the additional value and charm of a poetical anthology.

We hail this work as a great contribution to clear thought. Strange to say, while no one questions the necessity of long and patient study of materials and technics in the production of painting or sculpture or even of music, almost everybody thinks himself entitled to write poetry without the least study or scientific understanding of the instrument or methods of his art. Mere sentiment or imagination will not constitute the poet (par excellence, the “maker”), any more than a sensitiveness to color and harmony and form will furnish a painter, a musician, a sculptor or an architect. It is the ignoring of the fact that poetry is equally an art of representation, the picturing and moulding and singing of thoughts and feelings by visible and audible symbols, which accounts for the failure of many a promising aspirant for the bays, and not less for the confusion and foolishness of critics and the despair of editors. (G. P. Putnam's Sons.)

....“THE TREASURY OF DAVID.” By C. H. Spurgeon. Vol. VII. Ps. 125 to 150. This volume completes the work. It fully sustains the character of its predecessors as a repertory of comment and illustration. More citations from continental writers would have improved the contents, but as it is it furnishes the ordinary preacher an amount of edifying matter nowhere else to be gotten in the same compass. (Funk & Wagnalls.)

....The ninth semi-annual volume of “THE CENTURY” is now out. It comprises the numbers from November, 1885, to April, 1886. It is handsomely bound in cloth, gilt top, corresponding with the preceding volumes. Its upward of one thousand pages contain a large number of deeply interesting articles on questions of present and permanent importance; such as “Socialism” in its various phases, the prospect of “Church Union” in this country, etc.; also, the continuation of the attractive and extensively illustrated papers on the Battles and Leaders of the Civil War. The illustrations, accompanying several articles in each number, adorn the volume from beginning to end, and exhibit the very best artistic talent and execution. There is also a plentiful sprinkling of fascinating fiction, poetic gems, pleasing bric-à-brac, and other selections of light and choice literature. The volume abounds in a refreshing variety of matter, and no reader can fail to find a great deal in the bound Century, as well as in the monthly numbers, to his taste.

....“EAST ANGELS.” By Constance F. Woolson. No one who has followed this story as it has dragged its slow length along through “Harpers” but has felt the power of the author. No hand has ever drawn the life of Florida and its winter residents better. As to the characters, they stand out distinct and strongly individual, so that the reader becomes more and more interested in their fate. The “natives” are, perhaps, the best described, with the Cubans mingling with them, and their manners and customs seem to have been studied in the most thorough manner. As to the story itself, we are neither pleased nor profited. It is the old plot of the unhappy yet faithful wife, chained by her vows to a brute, while giving her heart to another. Winthrop seems to us “priggish,” and Margaret is somewhat stiff in all her goodness. The defect of the book is in keeping the story advancing long after the reader feels it ought to conclude somehow. To our thinking, Miss Woolson might just as well have let Margaret's husband die in the middle book, and then the story would have been charming. What are called “artistic endings” often mean depressing conclusions, which the author could have just as easily turned another way. When all this is said, however, we still yield to Miss Woolson the tribute due to one of the very best novel writers our country now possesses. (Harper & Brothers.)

....“THE LAST DAYS OF THE CONSULATE.” From the French of M. Fauriel. This is a singularly interesting volume. It contains a history of certain events immediately preceding the assumption of the imperial title and authority by Napoleon, written at the time and from the inside. It was discovered in MS. in 1883, in a somewhat remarkable way, as related in the introduction, by M. Lalaune, the editor.

The author, M. Claude Fauriel, historian, philosopher and literateur, was, for two years, secretary to Fouché, and therefore in a position to know the facts whereof he speaks. A real friend of the republic, he resigned his office when convinced of the ambitious designs of Napoleon, declining to be an agent in the promotion of plans whose purpose he abhored. The object of the record here presented is to show up the alleged English conspiracy against the life of the First Consul, and for the restoration of the Bourbons, as in reality a device of the French police, at the instigation of Napoleon himself. It sets the character of Napoleon in no enviable light, though for that purpose it was hardly needed. But it also presents a vivid picture of the times, the secret workings of the police, the perversions of justice, the prostitution of the forms of law to the will and to further the designs of an ambitious and unscrupulous usurper.

The interested reader will be almost as much disappointed that the chapter devoted to the trial of Moreau and the other “conspirators” is left unfinished by its author, as when an interesting romance is shorn of its expected denouement. (A. C. Armstrong & Son.)

....“RIGHT LIFE; or, Candid Talks on Vital Themes.” By Joseph A. Seiss, D.D., LL.D. Dr. Seiss, the pastor of the Church of the Holy Communion, Philadelphia, is a voluminous author, an eloquent preacher, and one of the most distinguished ministers of the Lutheran Church in this country. The twelve lectures printed in this book were meant to be “Talks,” or popular discourses on important subjects, and addressed to thoughtful people, to lead them to take a personal interest in religion; and also to present “leading questions of faith and to give the foundation principles of ‘Right Life,’ as against the Epicurean tendencies of the times which are doing so much mischief in many circles.” In this wholesome work we see the hand of “a master in Israel” on every page, a large acquaintance with prevailing errors and evils, and a skilful treatment of profound subjects with adequate learning and in the earnest style of public addresses. We heartily commend it to ministers and for thoughtful persons who are troubled with doubts and difficulties concerning the fundamentals of Christian belief and conduct. (J. B. Lippincott & Co.)

Periodicals, Serials and Notes.

....It is hard to imagine a more thorough change in the tone and methods of a magazine than has taken place in Lippincott's under the present régime,—whether for the better we leave its readers to decide. Certain it is that the North American Review has need to look to its laurels in the way of sensationism. The latter periodical's best card has been trumped by Lippincott's autobiography of Martin Irons, and W. H. Babcock's defence of Mormon polygamy, in the June number. Fred. Powers Perry's article on “The Industrial Republic” is smart, but not very deep or always “level.” The serials are good, especially “Taken by Siege.” But the number as a whole, while it may “sell,” strikes us as the extreme low-water mark of Lippincott.

....The June Century has for a frontispiece a portrait of Benjamin Franklin, engraved by J. H. E. Whitney, after a drawing by Kenyon Cox, from the bust by Houdon. This is followed by “A Literary Ramble Along the Thames from Fulham to Chiswick,” by Austin Dobson; “Meh Lady: A Story of the War,” by Thomas Nelson Page; the second paper on “American Country Dwellings,” by Mrs. Schuyler van Rensselaer, all handsomely illustrated. The War papers are “Stonewall Jackson in Maryland,” by Col. Henry Kyd Douglas: “Harper's Ferry and Sharpsburg,” by Gen. John G. Walker; “The Invasion of Maryland,” by James Longstreet; and “Antietam Scenes,” by Charles Carleton Coffin. All these deeply interesting articles are really matched by other contributors in this superb number.

....Babyhood, if maintained at its present high standard, will never prove disappointing to its many readers. The June number can fairly claim preëminence; it is the best of all the numbers yet sent forth. It is as usual packed with practical suggestions and homely wisdom. This number is accompanied with the “Gertrude Baby Suit,” as Supplement No. 19.

....The New Englander for June is a rich and timely issue. It contains no less than three articles treating different phases of the Labor Question, and all of them are sensible and effective. The opening paper on Moral Education in Prisons contains a great deal of matter drawn from the personal experience of the writer. It is interesting and suggestive. The number also contains President Porter's paper read at Phillips' Academy, on The Ideal Student, which is every way admirable. It is not often that so much good sense on the matter of education is set forth with so much clearness and force.

...No. 1 of the new volume of the American Journal of Philology opens with a valuable paper of Prof. Whitney, showing the inaccuracy of the version of the Upanishads contained in the Sacred Books of the East, vols. 1 and 15. Dr. C. R. Gregory treats of the Quires in Greek Manuscripts. Other articles are on Inchoative Verbs in Gothic, and Beowulf and English Verse. The Reviews and Book Notices are able and thorough, and the Reports of other periodicals are as usual very full. The number concludes with a warm and graceful tribute to the late Prof. C. D. Morris, whose death was a sore loss to sound scholarship and accurate learning.

....The chief features of the Art Journal for June are an account of the new animal painter, Richard Friese, with fair representations of his work, and a pleasant article on Capri, with nicely drawn illustrations. Mr. Hare continues his Untravelled France, and Mr. Godwin begins an interesting description of the Home of an English Architect. The educational power of a journal of this degree of excellence is very great.

....The Forum for June contains its usual instructive variety. Bishop Huntington gives an autobiographical sketch under the title, From Puritanism—Whither. Chancellor Vincent tells modestly How he was Educated. Prof. Newcomb has a judicious article on Mischievous Philanthrophy, and Dr. Hammon a very shallow essay on the Evolution of the Boycott. The Future of Sunday Journalism is set forth by a gentleman who puts “Rev.” before his name. Mr. Ward exalts this most injurious feature of our times into an ally of the pulpit and a factor of advanced civilization, whereas it is an enemy to both, and offers no promise of improvement.

Objections to Darwinism.

HERE we must admit in the first place that though we can study modes of variation of species, no case has actually occurred under the observation of naturalists of the development of a new species. We must also admit that such is the fixity of specific forms at present, and the nice equilibrium of all their parts, that the changes effected under domestication and by artificial selection seriously unsettle their stability, and cause the varieties and races produced, to exist under a condition of tension and unstable balance which renders them infertile and otherwise unlikely to survive if left to themselves. They have farther in favorable circumstances a strong tendency to revert to the original types. Again we must admit that on the supposition of slow and piecemeal alteration in a complex organism, we meet with endless difficulties, especially when we suppose the absence of a guiding will like that of the human breeder. We also find that in the past history of life in geological time, there are several great difficulties in the way of the idea of slow and gradual modification. One arises from the fact that we can trace most of the leading types so far back that they seem to constitute parallel rather than diverging lines, and show no certain evidence of branching. The continuance of the Lingulae and other Brachiopods from the Cambrian to the Modern, and more lately the history of the oysters, which have continued from the Carboniferous age to the present, and that of the Scorpions, which have continued from the Silurian, in both cases with scarcely any more differences than their successors present at the present day, may be taken as examples. With this must be connected the further fact that nearly all the early types of life seem very long ago to have reached stages so definite and fixed that they seem incapable of further development, constituting what have recently been called "terminal forms." A further difficulty arises from our failure to find satisfactory examples of the almost infinite connecting links which must have occurred in a gradual development. This, it may be said, proceeds from the imperfection of the record; but when we find abundance of examples of the young and old of many fossil species and can trace them through their ordinary embryonic development, why should we not find examples of the links which bound the species together. An additional difficulty is caused by the fact that in most types we find a great number of kinds in their earlier geological history and that they dwindle rather than increase as they go onward. This fact, established in so many cases as to constitute an actual law of palæontology, is altogether independent of the alleged imperfection of the record.

Objections of this kind appear to be fatal to the Darwinian idea of slow modifications proceeding equably throughout geological time, and to throw us back on a doctrine of sudden appearance of new forms, and this occurring at certain portions of geological time rather than at others, and in the earlier history of animal and vegetable types rather than in their later history, and in early geological times rather than in those more recent.

With respect to the origin of man himself, which is, no doubt, the most important point to us, these difficulties are enormous. We can trace man only a little way back in geological history, not farther than the Pleistocene period, and the earliest men are still men in all essential points, and separated from other animals, recent and fossil, by a gap as wide as that which exists now. Farther, if from the Pleistocene to the modern period man has continued essentially the same, this, on the principle of gradual development, would remove his first appearance not only far beyond the existence of any remains of man or his works, but beyond the time when any animals nearly approaching to him are known to have existed. This is independent altogether of the farther difficulties which attend the spontaneous origination of the mental and moral nature of our species. It would seem then that man must have been introduced, not by a process of gradual development, but in some abrupt and sudden way.—Principal Sir William Dawson, in Homiletic Review.

The General Outlook.

....The Standing Committee on the Freedmen of the Presbyterian Church (North) informed the Assembly that it had received for the year $116,219, that the colored churches had contributed to their own support $17,291, that the expenditures had been $120,119, and that the debt had been increased to $6,200. The Board has 202 churches under its care, 12 organized during the year; communicants 13,754, added during the year 1,680; Sabbath-schools 201, with 14,562 scholars; parochial schools, 99, teachers 184, and pupils 9,584. It was urged by the Secretary that the colored race in this country had increased from 4,000,000, at the end of the war to 7,000,000 at the present time, with property worth $91,000,000 and 2,000,000 acres of improved land, and had now 108 newspapers printed and published by themselves.

....The Board of Foreign Missions reported an income of $745,664 46, and expenditures in excess of income over $1,000, raising the debt, which was $57,651 at the beginning of the year, to nearly $59,000. The missions have 271 churches, with a membership of over 20,000, which contributed $23,000 last year for the support of the Gospel. Over 2,500 converts were received into church fellowship during the year. Of schools of all grades 461 are maintained, having about 25,000 pupils. The Assembly was urged to enter upon higher education, as being necessary. The Woman's Boards and societies paid into the Treasury during the year nearly $225,000.

....An earnest and prolonged discussion occurred over the Standing Committee on Temperance. It was strongly held that the work needful could be done by the other committees. The delegates were influenced considerably by the fact that the committee closed the year $2,100 in debt. Finally the committee was continued and the Secretary dispensed with.

....One of the most influential meetings held in connection with the Assembly was the elders' meeting on a Tuesday morning, to consider the claims of the Board of Ministerial Relief. A large audience was present. Except as Rev. Dr. Cattell, the Secretary, answered questions, the talking was all done by elders, and very pertinent, practical talk it was. The conclusion was unanimous that the income of the Board must be increased.

....The consecration of English university men to missionary work has been one of the most encouraging incidents in the progress of the Church during a few years past. Mr. Moody's meetings resulted in the movement, which is still going forward. Recently thirty Cambridge men have sent the following manly letter to the Church Missionary Society, offering their services if they are desired:

To Rev. F. E. Wignam, M.A.—Dear Sir: We, the undersigned, desire respectfully to explain that, though pledged at present, more or less, to home work, we are equally willing, if God's Providence opens the way, to look forward to offering ourselves for missionary work, should openings for us be found within the next few years. The only fitness for foreign work we venture to claim is, that we are willing, by the grace of God, to go where most wanted. We would not seek difficulty or danger for its own sake, but we would be ready to incur either, where necessary, rather than that Christ's cause should suffer from His people's want of zeal, or England cease to be foremost in missionary work. We ask that you will kindly entertain this, our prospective offer, at least by letting us know from time to time of such openings as you may think suitable to us individually, even of such as might be only of a temporary character. We venture to hope that the committee will think it worth while to retain our names and addresses, and they will, no doubt, make any further personal inquiries they may think necessary.

AUNT MARJORIE'S CORNER

Vacation for the Little Ones.

OUR boys and girls, released from the tedium of school, will presently be as free as birds on the wing. How charming is the feeling of liberty which comes with the first days of vacation. We owe to them, after their school-room confinement, the very best time in our power to give. If country rambles, fishing for happy hours in the brook, playing house under the trees, and picnicing in the woods are possible, the pale cheeks will grow rosy, the languid eyes bright, under a course of out door play under such conditions. Let the little girls wear stout washable fabrics or serviceable flannel dresses, which will not keep them in distress lest they shall be torn or soiled, and give the boys leave to wear out their old jackets and trousers. It is a great mistake to dress children in so fine a manner that they cannot move without the peril of mother's displeasure. Never shall I forget the feeling of shocked resentment with which I once saw a summer neighbor pounce upon her pretty boy of seven, who had been sent out in all the glory of starched frills and immaculate knee pants to sit still on the veranda till tea time. Sit still, indeed, two mortal hours, with not a thing on earth to do, and the boy only seven. A half hour of such passivity was all he could endure, and, not meaning to be disobedient, only forgetful, he was after that allured into a game of marbles with a less elegantly arrayed young gentleman, to the detriment of his spotless toilet.

Mamma appeared on the scene magnificent. "Eddie! Eddie!" Her shrill voice raised in anger startled the little culprit, who approached her tremblingly, shrinking as if to avoid a blow.

"I told you what to expect, sir, if you played in the grass!" and the angry woman swept her unfortunate son before her to her room, to receive a whipping which would not have been more severe had the boy told a lie.

If children are to have good times in vacation, let them be in reasonable independence of their wardrobes. After a day's pleasure, when they are freshly bathed and dressed, it is not unreasonable to exact of them quiet and care, yet even then the wise mother will produce the story book, the game of authors, or the dissected map; or she will see that the older children amuse the younger ones in some pleasant way.

For the multitudes to whom no prolonged summer outing is possible, the city affords many short excursions, long and delightful days in the parks, trips on the river, and other agreeable bits of change.

Let the vacation be as full of innocent recreation as possible. Holiday times should be gala times.

AUNT MARJORIE.

Home Study of the Bible.

THERE are indices which may be trusted as unerring. When a scholar in the class gropes blindly around the Old Testament to find the Epistle of James, or fumbles through the New in a hopeless search for the prophecy of Amos, it is evident that her home reading of the Bible is very superficial. Our children read other books with diligence; it is to be feared that in many households the Bible-reading is confined to the minimum of time and attention. Every Sunday-school teacher is aware that while one or two pupils find a reference with ease, the majority, even when it is drawn from Christian homes, has little familiarity with the order of the Bible books, and knows too little even of the incidents and narratives which ought to be inwrought with the intellectual and spiritual life.

Hearing not long ago of a lady who declined to allow her children to attend Sabbath-school because she wished them to be taught the Bible, the first impulse was to exclaim against her narrowness. But on second thoughts there came the inquiry whether she had not a measure of reason on her side. The parent who, in these breathless days, takes time to personally instruct her children in the truths of religion, will be in a measure independent of the Sunday-school, which should never be a substitute for, but only an auxiliary of the church.

That many parents seem on the whole satisfied with the non-attendance of their children at church, if only they go regularly to the Sunday-school, is unfortunately patent to all observers.

Yet the fault is with the parents, not with the Sunday-school.

The Leading Thought.

IN a Sunday-school of which I have knowledge, it is the custom of the superintendent just before closing the school, to call upon each class for the thought which has been specially brought home by the lesson. Extended speeches are not required or expected, and there is time only to listen to impressions reported concisely in as few words as possible. Either the teacher or one of the scholars, as the name of the class is called, rises and states the teaching which has been nearest the heart of all as they have studied the portion of the day.

So many-sided is every lesson, and so full of truth not only, but of different aspects and phases of truth, that often in the experience of the teacher there is an embarrassment of riches. We scarcely know whether we have a leading thought or not, so many thoughts press upon us and claim attention. Perhaps the great fault in much of our teaching is from this cause, a lack of definiteness. Our children go home without a single, clear, crisp lesson to carry with them and live by during the week.

I think, however clear and well emphasized our teaching may be on other points, we ought to aim in every lesson to send home, fastening like a nail in a sure place, one direct spiritual meaning derived from the verses into which we are looking. It is not enough to teach geography, or history, or Oriental manners and customs, not enough to reproduce the old landscape and the feeling of the companies gathered by the Sea of Galilee, or in the shadows of Hermon;—in every lesson, if we would do good, we must see Jesus. A large proportion unfortunately of our city Sunday scholars go very irregularly to church and have no settled church home. For the instruction which is to lift them, for the persuasions which are to bring them to the Lamb who taketh away the sin of the world, they must come to the Sunday-school. The teacher should be faithful, since his responsibility is so great. From the Sunday-school we should expect constant reinforcements for the church, from the ranks of non-church-goers, taking it for granted as we do that the children who have no place in the church, are not those of church-attending parents.

To know for ourselves the leading thought of the lesson, to pray over it, asking that it may be blessed to those who receive it, to be unsatisfied unless we are sure that our class is getting something beyond a nebulous view of the truth, something which will stick fast in memory and be appropriated in life, ought to be our aim. Do we pray enough? As we mourn over the meagre results and are grieved that so few come to the Lord, do we not seem to hear Him saying again, "Without Me ye can do nothing." Always He is ready to give us Himself, but are we always in earnest and importunate in our asking?

The Mother's Opportunity.

PERHAPS mothers forget their responsibility for the training of their own children in religious opinions as well as in daily practice. Certainly, if the realization of their duty were vivid and strong, they would at least insist on daily Bible reading, each child for him or herself, until the habit should be formed, and they would treasure, as precious beyond earthly weighing, the half-hour every day when they might read the Bible with their little ones; read and talk as only mothers can. E. F. R.

Day by Day.

ALL uncertainty in regard to methods disappears for the Christian when he learns what mode God commends in any course of action. God's way of growth for His people is the day-by-day method. The inward man is renewed day by day. Temple sacrifices were to be day by day continually. Temple praise was a daily lifting up of the priestly voices, singing with instruments of strength unto the Lord. That which the priests had need of was to be given them day by day. The manna was to be gathered, the portion of a day in his day.

God's way of assimilating His people to Himself has always been by this day-by-day plan. Accessions of strength will come by means of the portion in his day, just as long as the new day is a call to new life and fresh enthusiasm. The bread for soul-subsisting is no exception to the law of distribution by the day for the daily recurring need.

God has on His part for us each a "daily allowance." It is to be given us of the king, a daily rate for every day all the days of our life—prepared and apportioned according to royal standards. And what if we had never or most rarely received all that God had set apart for our allowance on any one day? What fuller growth, power and sweetness would come into our lives if we should begin at once to receive all that God intends for us each day as it comes!

Receiving and using all the spirit of praise which He allows as a daily rate, fills us with gratitude for daily benefits and banishes every murmur.

Receiving and using all the spirit of prayer which is ours by His bestowing, enables us to pray in the Holy Ghost.

Receiving and using all the power of service which is our King's allowance, we accomplish spiritual service in the winning of souls according to His thought, not our own.

Receiving in its fulness the meaning of that "mysterious He for me, which is the substance of the Gospel," what resolution, what freedom, what enthusiasm, what love it gives us!

The constantly renewed receiving of this Spirit-taught mystery day by day nourishes us in true growth until the day of our swift assimilation, our instantaneous likeness to our Lord. Let us receive each day all that day can hold of the largeness of the King's gift to us. MARY C. GATES.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.

Smooth the Angles.

DEAR AUNT MARJORIE: Through the pages of the INTELLIGENCER I have become quite familiar with yourself and your little "Corner," reading with increasing interest the chit-chat of its numerous occupants. May I say one word?

For nearly a month I have been a member of the "Shut In Society," receiving my only impression of the outside world through the apple-blossoms or wild flowers standing upon my table. I have endeavored to be patient, often comforting myself with the old colored woman's "scripter passage," "Grin and bear it." I would hint to others similarly afflicted, that it is a very consoling text to ponder upon, although wonderfully original.

There is a woman in this great round world of ours who has the faculty of always looking upon the bright side of the question. No matter what presents itself, whether of sorrow or of joy, the same cheerful spirit triumphs. People have expressed their astonishment at her ever ready "It is all for the best," or "It will all be right at last." Such a life is a benediction; her pleasant manner of accepting the inevitable—a rare gift, born of heaven.

Yesterday was one of Hawthorne's peaceful "Sundays at Home." When we awoke in the morning our eyes opened upon a flood of sunlight. Gentle breezes rustled the tender leaves or played at hide-and-seek among the tiny blades of grass. Recent evening showers gave a new impulse to springing life on every hand, while the birds, happy to overflowing, filled the air with their bewildering strains. The scene without sent a thrill to my heart. I prayed for the sick and afflicted everywhere that strength might be granted them "according to their day." There was something in the very atmosphere calculated to make the world akin—a magnetic influence I was not able to explain. When I turned within my room, in every direction my eyes were greeted with tokens of love sent to cheer my hours of isolation. It seemed impossible to realize that mankind, through the Fall, had lost the image of its Maker. There was immense comfort in the knowledge that so much of a likeness still existed.

I must relate a little incident. One evening there was a ring at the door. When it was answered I heard a little eight-year-old pipe out: "Won't you please give that to your mamma and tell her Sadie sent it?" It was a spray of wild honeysuckle. I need not inform you it was prized above the rarest.

You recollect the story of the old Quaker, who suggested, as people travelled through the world but once, it were better to smile than frown as they passed along.

Some people have such a pleasant way of rounding off the corners, while others square them so perfectly that the points penetrate like a sword, forcing a wound from which it is often difficult to recover.

Now, Aunt Marjorie, I know there are a multitude of aching hearts whose possessors have the reputation of being disagreeable and cross-grained, simply on account of these miserably "sharp corners."

I know, of a surety, the more sympathy we receive the more loving we become; and the more of the latter quality we have the more Christlike we grow. We creep right into the heart of our Saviour, nestling down with the same confidence and trust as a little child on the bosom of its mother.

O, for more widespread kindness of feeling among hristians toward the afflicted in whatever form. If , there would be a more general acceptance of the d woman's "scripter passage," "Grin and bear it."

...."How They Learned Housework." By hristina Goodwin. Several little girls, I beg their ardon, several girls between fourteen and eighteen ears of age, were obliged to take a vacation in rm time, owing to the illness of their teacher. heir mothers put their heads together, and the re-lt was that a housework class was formed, in hich the girls, dressed in a neat uniform, white rons and caps, and prepared with suitable tools, tacked successively different kinds of housework, d under the supervision of an experienced matron arned how to sweep, dust, make beds, scrub and ok. The book is charming—a happy thought hap-ly expressed.—Aunt Marjorie. (D. Lothrop & Co.)

...."Atla: A Story of the Lost Island," by Mrs. Gregory Smith, is a highly imaginative and highly tertaining prose-poem, descriptive of life as it may supposed to have been on the legendary island of tlantis. The author has made a careful study of e civilization of the remote past. In her book she ves a vivid outline of the attainments made by the cients in science and the useful arts. Toward the se occurs an eloquent account of the cataclysm by hich Atlantis is said to have been forever swept m human sight. Time spent in reading the story by no means wasted. (Harper & Bros.)

...."Down the West Branch," by Capt. Far-r, tells of the visit of a party of Boston boys to the aine Wilderness. The adventures described are in-resting, but the book is not of good literary qual-, nor, indeed, free from slang. (Lee & Shepard.)

CHILDREN'S PORTFOLIO.

The Wild Flowers.

THE violet blooms in a shady place
Where the sun comes peeping through;
The hare-bell grows on gray old rocks
And shows its robes of blue.

The May-flower grows on a wooded hill,
At the foot of the green old pines,
Where the ferns and mosses in clusters show,
And the checker-berry twines.

These all grow in the fairest bowers;
There is no room for the daisy flowers.

So the daisy grows by the dusty road,
Sweet and sunny and shy,
Lifting its pretty, modest head
To nod to each passer-by.

"Why do you grow by the roadside, dear?
It is all dust and sand;
Come to the violet's shady nook,
Or join the May-flower's band."

But the daisy said: "The violet's place
Is better for her, you see;
And the May-flower's place is better for her,
And mine is the best for me." —St. Nicholas.

Teneo Et Teneor.

THE Morris family was sitting around the large open fire in the dining-room one wintry evening t December. Harry, aged twelve, was busy with Latin Reader, while the other children were look-g at pictures, and Mrs. Morris was sewing.

'Father," said Harry, looking up from his book, what does 'tenuit' mean? I can't find it in my icon."

'I don't wonder, my boy; it is the perfect of neo,' I hold. By the by, I shall have a story to l about that verb when you shall have finished ur studying."

Half an hour later the four children were gathered ound Mr. Morris, and he began:

'A number of years ago I was travelling in rope in company with some gentlemen, friends of ne. I think you all have heard me speak of Mr. ton; he was one of the party, and if you were to in his office to-day you would see hanging above desk the motto, 'Teneo et teneor.' What does at mean, Harry?"

'I hold and I am held," was the prompt reply.

'Well, among other places which we visited, was e Strasbourg Cathedral. Up and up the tower we nt until we reached the platform where travellers nally stop. The view was a grand one, but we re ambitious and wanted to go even higher. So e guide unlocked a door and we climbed up, up, til we reached the end of the inside staircase. We re up so high that everything below looked like le toys, and we could hardly realize that the peo-e and horses were not mechanical playthings und and set in motion for our especial benefit.

'But Mr. Eaton was not satisfied; he wanted to go to the top. To do this it was necessary to make the remainder of the ascent on the outside—a very dangerous thing even for one so cool-headed as he. Notwithstanding our warning he stepped out and commenced his hazardous climb. Slowly, slowly, farther and farther up he went, until he finally reached the top, more than four hundred feet above the pavement. Unintentionally, he looked downward; a feeling of dizziness began to come over him, and he began to realized that he could not very long keep his balance. Glancing around he saw only the four iron bars which support the cross at the very top. These were too far apart; they could not help him. Looking upward, so as to keep his eyes from below, he saw an iron ring hanging from the foundation of the cross. So dizzy that he could hardly see to guide himself, he put, first one hand, then the other, on that ring and held on. Fortunately, the ring was so firmly fixed that it held, too."

"But, papa, how did he go down?" queried Harry.

"Oh, he waited, with his eyes closed, till the dizziness passed away; then he climbed down safely."

Mr. Morris leaned back in his chair and closed his eyes. Then May climbed up on his lap and said: "But, papa, you didn't tell us the moral; most all of your stories have morals."

"And do you like the morals so very much, kitten, that you want one for every story?"

"No—o, papa, I'm afraid it isn't that. But it's so interesting to see it begin in the story and follow it out, and it's so nice when the moral I find is the same as the one you have."

"And what one did my May find here?"

"I don't know as I can 'spress myself, but I think you meant that we should hold to the cross, not the one at Strasbourg, but the other."

"Yes, May, that is just what I mean. Hold to the Cross of Christ, and be held by it."

E. M. Clark.

Sunny and Bright.

A VISITOR went one cold day to see a poor girl, kept at home by a lame hip. The room was on the north side of a bleak house. It was not pleasant without, and was certainly cheerless within. Poor girl, she seemed to have very little cheer, and as you entered the room the first thought was: "If she only had a sunny room on the south side of the house." Thinking of this her visitor said: "You never have any sun, not a ray comes into these windows. Sunshine is everything; I wish you could have a little." "O," the young girl answered, "my sun pours in at every window, and even through the cracks. All the light I want is Jesus. He shines in here and makes everything bright to me." And no one could doubt her who saw the sweet smile of happiness on her upturned face. Yes! Jesus "the Sun of Righteousness" shining in, can make any spot beautiful and any home happy. Let Jesus shine in all the little hearts, and make them little rays of light, shining in dark places, lighting up home, school and playground.—Ex.

Fresh Air for City Children.

A FEW years ago a lady who owns a large farm near one of our great cities in which there is an asylum for the deaf and dumb, happened to pass the gate one summer afternoon with a basket of fern, pitcher plant, and mosses in her hand. A class of boys who had just returned from their daily march through the streets, were entering, and seeing the homely little blossoms, crowded about her, talking together with waving hands and excited fingers.

"It is so long since they have seen anything from the country," apologized the teacher.

"Do they never go out of the city?" asked the lady, as she distributed her treasures.

"No; they are here for five years. They go out, as now, to walk every day. They have a gymnasium for exercise. But there is, of course, no money for country excursions."

The lady went home and consulted her neighbors. They baked and boiled, roasted chickens, made sandwiches. Their husbands contributed a little money. The next week the deaf and dumb pupils marched to one of the stations. How they talked! With eyes, hands, arms, laughing faces, dancing feet, everything but voices. Never were so many happy people tingling with life from head to foot crowded in one car. Never did the country give such rapturous welcome to guests before. The visit has been repeated every year since then.

A gentleman, a member of the Philadelphia City Councils, happened once to pass down an alley carrying a chestnut in its burr. The street waifs crowded about him, but not one of them knew what it was.

"Off a tree?" said one. "I thought nuts come in bar'ls."

"And in the park of Philadelphia," reflected the councilman, "there are thousands of nut trees untouched!"

He broke into the financial debates of Councils at the next meeting with the astounding proposition that a sum be set aside each year for Nutting Day; that the children of the public schools on that day be transported to the park, where they should bag all the nuts they could gather.

This unpractical motion passed with acclamation, and from that year the poor children of Philadelphia have added a holiday to their list, as dear as Christmas or the Fourth of July.

God may or may not have given us wealth, influence or talent. But He always does give us opportunities to make the lives of other men and women and children fuller and happier. Do we use them?—Youth's Companion.

A Grateful Cow.

A WOMAN in England had a cow which she used to pet a great deal. One day the cow seeing this woman's husband beating her, came charging up the field and attacked the man with such ferocity that he was glad to retreat. The cow then took up a position by the woman's side, and stood there until she was able to take refuge from her husband.

"Mother," said a little boy, "I waked up thanking God." That is waking up beautifully A child waking up so will never come down stairs cross, or find fault with his breakfast.

fragile but well-proportioned frame; a shapely, compact head; a face beaming with intellectual light, with rare, almost feminine beauty of feature and complexion; a fascinating courtesy of manner; and a fulness, swiftness and elegance of silvery speech." It is said that his "whole aspect and manner exercised an undefinable attraction over every one, gentle and simple, who came within its influence." This magnetic being, born in 1785 at Greenway, is said to have written Greek with ease at 13, and at 15 could talk in Greek fluently, and without embarrassment. This, as it seems to me, rather doubtful compliment was paid him by one of his masters, "that boy could harangue an Athenian mob better than you and I could address an English one." During his second year at Oxford, he first tasted opinion to quiet neuralgic pains. From that first taste came the horrible gauntlet an opium-eater runs, perhaps falling in the endeavor, and from it came also the "Confessions." It is not every man who is willing to publicly pole his life with the signal board, "dangerous," and how few could erect so elegant a signal!

I have just spoken of a willingness to raise a pole. Some of the Massachusetts people desire to take one down on Sunday, namely, the barber's. The knights of the razor themselves petitioned that their occupation might be forbidden by the authorities. It is a good sign; respect for Sunday as a day of worship and rest. There is a case of resistance to the law though, and the defence is that shaving on Sunday is a necessity within the meaning of the statute. Bearded men will not find it difficult to demolish that point, and others ought not to bother the barbers on Sunday.

NEPONSET.

The Springs of Sorrow.

BY WM. RANKIN DURYEE, D.D.

[Read at the funeral services of Mrs. Erminnie A. Smith.]

WE mourn not those who drink Life's genial wine,
And while their pulses feel the warmest thrill,
Lay down the goblet at a call divine
For richer feasts which nobler longings fill.

Nor tears for those who, like the guarded flowers
When deepest hued, are from companions torn,
As walks the Master in His loving hours
Plucking the rose which may His home adorn.

We weep not when, with sudden wrench, the gem
Is from unseemly setting forced apart,
To sparkle on a monarch's diadem,
Or flash its rays on some delighted heart.

But constant tears for those who here must quaff
Life's bitter dregs, or fading long must stay
To meet the winter, while with scornful laugh
A mocking world sweeps by upon the way.

Not thee we mourn, oh friend, as fall our tears,
Thine is the rest, the glory, and the gain;
We grieve that we more lonely walk the years
And weaker turn to earthly toil and pain.

But brighter are the skies since thou art there,
Warmer the welcome for these parting tears;
The farewell that we breathe is Faith's sure prayer
That soon may dawn for us God's golden years.

The State Sunday-School Convention.

THE Thirty-first Annual Convention of the New York State Sunday-School Association was held in the city of Buffalo during the past week.

For three days three sessions a day were held in the large auditorium of the Central Presbyterian Church. At some of the meetings it was estimated that over 3,000 persons were present, and the enthusiasm was intense. From the reports of the Committees it was generally conceded that the best work the Association had ever done, was accomplished during the past year.

The full proceedings of the Convention have been published in the Buffalo Express in a special edition, to which we refer all those who are interested in this important branch of Christian work.

Our space this week will only allow us to give the names of the principal speakers and the subjects of their addresses.

On the first day Rev. Theo. L. Cuyler, D.D., of Brooklyn, representing the Presbyterian Church, addressed the convention on the subject, "The Claims of Temperance on Church and School." The Baptist Church was represented by Rev. H. M. Sanders, D.D., of New York, who spoke on "The Ground and Motive of Mission Work."

On the second day, Rev. Wm. W. Clark, of Staten Island, representing the Reformed Church, spoke on the theme, "How to Study and Teach the Scriptures," and Rev. I. J. Lansing, of the Methodist Church in Brooklyn, made an address on "Christ the Teacher's Model."

Owing to sickness, Rev. W. S. Rainsford, of St. George's Episcopal Church in New York, was unable to be present, and his place was filled by Rev. S. R. Fuller, rector of Free St. Johns, Buffalo, who took for his theme, "Some of the Obstacles to Securing Success in Mission Work."

The third day Rev. Dr. Meredith, of the Congregational Church in Boston, addressed the meeting on "The Great Teacher, the Model Teacher," and in the afternoon conducted a Bible class, giving an exposition of the lesson for the following Sunday.

The last meeting was taken up with the final reports of the committees, and farewell addresses b the Buffalo pastors. Altogether the convention was pronounced a great success, and its delegates have gone to their respective fields better equipped for their work for the Master.

Believing that many will be interested and profited in reading the address on the Scriptures by Rev. Mr. Clark of our own Church, we will publish the same in succeeding numbers.

Financial.

TUESDAY, JUNE 15TH.—It is next to impossible to say anything worth saying, anything to indicate a way out of the depression existing the world over. Every man must do the best he can. Trade is better than at this time last year, but is light. A few dealers are making something, the large majority are making very little. Money has been lost by the strikes, but the causes of the depression existed before the strikes and have simply been aggravated.... Imports of merchandise at this port last week amounted to $7,918,425, and exports to $5,941,684. The export of specie footed up $639,962. Sterling exchange sold yesterday at 4 87 1-2 for 60 day bills and 4.89 1-2 for demand. The Bank of England reduced its rate of discount to 2 1-2 per cent....The bank report shows an increase in loans of $785,100, in legal tenders of $,4,296,300, in deposits of $3,139,-600, and a decrease in specie of $926 400. There was added to the surplus of reserve $2,585,000, making it $14,652,975. The rates of money are unchanged, on call 1 1-2 to 2 1-2 per cent, on prime commercial paper 3 1-2 to 4 1-2, on ordinary time loans well secured 5 per cent....Foreign grain markets tend to lower prices. Quotations yesterday were: Wheat here 84, in Chicago 74 3-8; corn here 45 1-4, in Chicago 35 3-4; oats here 33 7-8, in Chicago 28 1-4.... The closing quotations for cotton yesterday were: June 9.2-4, July 9.11-12, Aug. 9.23-24, Sept. 9.10-11, and so down to Jan. 9.4-5....The supply of hay is not as large, and No. 1 timothy ranges from 85 cents to $1; long rye straw is worth from 85 to 90 cents, oat and wheat 45 to 55. Provisions were a trifle more in demand at the end of the week. There seems to be more of all kinds of food than there are mouths to eat it. After a while affairs generally will, no doubt, adjust themselves to this novel, but who will venture stable, condition....The bank clearances for last week show a gain of 46 5-10 per cent on the corresponding week of last year. The New York gain was 19 5-10, Philadelphia 25 9-10, Chicago, New Orleans, Kansas City, Minneapolis and some others over 20 per cent; Omaha 78 per cent. An encouraging report.

Market Report.

Review of the New York Market for Butter, Cheese, etc. Reported by DAVID W. LEWIS & Co., Produce Commission Merchants, 49 Pearl St., New York.

Commission on Butter, Eggs, Poultry, etc., is five per cent; Flour, Grain, etc., 2½ per cent.

Marking-plates furnished when desired.

NEW YORK, June 12, 1886.

BUTTER.—Receipts for the week, 53,973 pks.; exports 3,638 pks.

The market is speculatively sustained. The low ruling prices tempt buying, and large amounts of butter are going into cold storage, and the disposition to buy and hold is accelerated by the proposed imposition of a tax upon imitations. So far the season has been exceedingly propitious and the make has been large, and a fair, if not an abundant hay crop is assured. The speculative buying has low prices for its basis, which is favorable to its outcome. It has a stimulus from expected legislation, which, if the result shall be the same as when the State law was passed, will prove a delusion. It has but little export call to back it, but last year the market was carried through without exports. Anyhow, if the product shall prove to have been stored away from a present surfeited market for the future use of greater needs, then it will equalize values and perform a needed service. At current prices butter seems cheap. One hundred packages of extra Western June creamery make was offered at 18c., and had 17¾c. bid. Two lots of 25 packages extra Western creamery firsts were sold at 16½c. We quote:

Fancy creamery	18 @18½
do dairy (selections)	16 @18
Good to fine	13 @15
Poor to common	7 @12½

CHEESE.—Receipts for the week, 61,794 boxes; exports 46,113 boxes.

The first half the week there was a strong, good market from export buyers up to 7½c. Later in the week foreign advices were not as favorable, and 7⅝c. was the best attainable top for export. Skimmed cheese are faring hard. Some hard skims sold at 25a50c. per box. A lot of so-called night skims sold on the dock at 4c. We quote:

Factory, full cream, fine	7¼@ 7½
" fair to good	6½@ 7
" skims	1 @ 3

EGGS.—Receipts for the week were 11,247 bbls. and 13,054 cases.

This market is dull and slow. Supply full up to the demand. We quote:

Near-by marks, fresh eggs	12 @13
Western and Canada	10½@11½

Health, Happiness and Longevity,

What a blessing to possess—without which no one can be happy. Half our trials and troubles of this life are due to ill-health, but there is a remedy—very little known—which has and is sold almost entirely on its merits. That is the Great Blood Purifier, Franklin Howes' Medical Discovery, composed entirely of roots and herbs, and may be justly called Nature's own remedy. It builds up the general health, cures Malaria, Dyspepsia, Constipation, Rheumatism, Chills and Fever, and hundred other complaints—all of which are more or less due from a disordered condition of the stomach, liver and blood. If your druggist does not keep it write to us. Send for "Testimonial Book" to Franklin Howes & Son, 755 Broadway, New York city, and we will forward to your address.

Ayer's Hair Vigor is a universal beautifier. Harmless, effective, and agreeable, it has taken high rank among toilet articles. This preparation causes thin and weak hair to become abundant, strong, and healthy, and restores to gray hair its original color.

Sick Headache. Thousands who have suffered intensely with sick headache say that Hood's Sarsaparilla has completely cured them. One gentleman thus relieved, writes: "Hood's Sarsaparilla is worth its weight in gold." Sold by all druggiststs. 100 doses $1.

MARRIAGES.

HOAGLAND—BEEKMAN.—At the residence of the bride's mother, Middlebush, N. J., June 9, by Rev. James Le Fevre, assisted by Prof. T. S. Doolittle, D.D., Garrett G. Hoagland, M.D., of Franklin Park, N. J., to Mary Emma, daughter of the late Theo. Beekman, and granddaughter of Cornelius W. Wyckoff.

SMITS—HULL.—By Rev. A. Vennema, June 9, at the residence of the bride's parents, Rev. B. Smits and Miss Helen L. Hull, both of Constantine, Mich.

DEATHS.

DE BEY.—At his home with his parents, Rev. and Mrs. B. de Bey, Chicago, Ill., Dr. Gerardus B. de Bey, in the 30th year of his age.

Deceased was the second son of Rev. B. de Bey, and was suddenly taken away by congestion of the brain.

He was a beloved son, a dear brother and a true friend. And more; he was an eminent and sincere Christian, a sympathetic physician, a faithful teacher in the Sabbath-school and an earnest Christian worker in the church to which he belonged, and in general among the community around him.

His funeral took place on Saturday, June 5th, at his father's church, amid an unusual large and sorrowing concourse of people, both relatives and friends. Rev. B. Van Ess, of Roseland, Ill., preached the sermon from Gen. 42:13, the last clause, and Rev. Dr. Goodwin, of the First Congregational Church, Chicago, addressed the audience in the English language.

The loss of Dr. de Bey is deeply felt, not only by his relatives, but by all who knew him. Though absent he is not and will not soon be forgotten. He is gone to obtain the reward of his work and the end of his faith. "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth," "and their works do follow them." B. D. B.

MESICK.—At Claverack, N. Y., May 24, Abram J. Mesick, in the 75th year of his age.

Mr. Mesick was a native of Claverack, but lived about twenty years in the town of Stuyvesant, during which time he attended at first the Second Reformed Church of Ghent, where he confessed Christ, and afterward was among the most active in the organization of the Reformed Church of Stuyvesant Falls, where he and his family attended until they removed to Claverack, when they united with the First Church there. Mr. Mesick served in the consistories of all the churches with which he was connected, and was a regular attendant.

His health had not been good for several years, but he was able to go out till the beginning of the present year, when his last sickness began, which was long and painful, but was endured with great patience and Christian courage.

Ayer's Hair Vigor keeps the hair soft and pliant, imparts to it the lustre and freshness of youth, causes it to grow luxuriantly, eradicates Dandruff, cures all scalp diseases, and is the most cleanly of all hair preparations.

AYER'S Hair Vigor has given me perfect satisfaction. I was nearly bald for six years, during which time I used many hair preparations, but without success. Indeed, what little hair I had, was growing thinner, until I tried Ayer's Hair Vigor. I used two bottles of the Vigor, and my head is now well covered with a new growth of hair. —Judson B. Chapel, Peabody, Mass.

HAIR that has become weak, gray, and faded, may have new life and color restored to it by the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. My hair was thin, faded, and dry, and fell out in large quantities. Ayer's Hair Vigor stopped the falling, and restored my hair to its original color. As a dressing for the hair, this preparation has no equal.—Mary N. Hammond, Stillwater, Minn.

VIGOR, youth, and beauty, in the appearance of the hair, may be preserved for an indefinite period by the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. A disease of the scalp caused my hair to become harsh and dry, and to fall out freely. Nothing I tried seemed to do any good until I commenced using Ayer's Hair Vigor. Three bottles of this preparation restored my hair to a healthy condition, and it is now soft and pliant. My scalp is cured, and it is also free from dandruff.—Mrs. E. R. Foss, Milwaukee, Wis.

The Church.

Christianity in Japan.

[COMMUNICATED BY A JAPANESE GENTLEMAN.]

SOME seven years ago, at the ceremony of graduation in the Tokyo University, a speaker (now occupying a high official position) ascended the platform, and before proceeding to his subject, rebuked the audience, chiefly composed of students of the University, for their impolite bearing towards the preceding speakers, many of them having worn their hats, coughed, and made various noises to interrupt the addresses. But, as might have been expected, the only effect of the rebuke was that more heads were covered, and louder and more frequent coughs and noises were heard. When, however, the speaker announced, amidst this confusion, the subject of his speech, the entire hall was suddenly hushed into silence, and the fractious students, one by one, took off their hats. The subject was Christianity, and as the speaker was notorious for his dislike of that religion, all the audience waited in breathless silence to hear what this patriot had to say about their common enemy, the "foreign creed." Great was the joy and universal the satisfaction when the speaker fervently denounced Christianity as the most hateful enemy of reason, of science, and of everything that was good and right. He left the platform amidst cheers and clapping of hands.

Such was the state of our feelings at that time towards the "foreign religion." I was then a student in the Yobimon, and remember that there was in my class a zealous Greek believer. During the hours of recreation we used to gather round him and press him with various questions as to the existence of God, the personality of Christ, and so forth; not because we had any serious desire of obtaining information on these topics, but merely with the object of seeking out matter for ridicule and derision. We told him to his face that he was unpatriotic, nay even that he was a traitor to his country. About this time Professor Morse, of Salem, was very popular among us, on account of his lectures on the Darwinian theory of the descent of man. We students picked up here and there from these lectures materials to controvert the Christian revelation, and no opportunity was lost of giving vent to our feelings of dislike in public lectures and private conversations. Indeed, our attitude towards Christianity was not that of mere objection founded on reason. An intensely patriotic desire to preserve the integrity of our sacred country was at the bottom of all our ill-feeling towards the creed of foreign nations. We hated Christianity and Christians, because these words were in our minds synonymous with whatever was opposed to the honor and independence of the nation.

A marvellous change has been wrought in our feelings towards Christianity in the short space of the past seven years. Counting over my old friends in the Yobimon, I observe that some have since turned earnest believers, while the rest no longer entertain sentiments of deadly hatred towards Christianity. On the contrary, they willingly admit that the introduction of that religion into this country is highly beneficial. Not only among students—most potent social factors in Japan—is this startling change observable; but even in the ranks of journalists, public speakers, lawyers, merchants, and officials, the metamorphosis has been equally, if not more, thorough. Look over the files of any of the papers published seven years ago, and you will find that statements therein made about Christianity are all permeated with a strong flavor of national prejudice and hatred. But now-a-days no journal utters anything in the least degree antagonistic to that faith. Nay, on the contrary, all of them confidently predict that Japan will soon become a thoroughly Christian country. Nor is this change limited to the capital. In a recent visit to my native province, which has the reputation of being one of the most conservative in the whole Empire, I was struck by the altered attitude of the inhabitants towards Christianity. When I left it ten years ago, the people had a lively apprehension of the "foreign religion" as something extremely wicked. Even now there is neither missionary nor church there, but the people have already heard something about the Western creed, and, instead of dreading it, they admit that it must be a good religion. In a word, Japan's strong national prejudice against the "foreign religion" has been entirely removed, and it is scarcely too much to say that the whole nation is ready to welcome Christianity. To illustrate this I may refer to one out of many recent instances of the conversion of Buddhist acolytes. In an eminently flourishing Buddhist seminary in Tokyo, one of the most promising students recently became a Christian, and is now a member of a Japanese Christian Church. The principal of the seminary had watched this student's career with the deepest anxiety, and when the youth at last declared his conversion, he was entreated to remain at the seminary and offered a competence for the rest of his life; for the principal dreaded that the apostacy of one of the most influential of his disciples would exercise a very injurious effect upon the rest of the students. I need scarcely say that these offers were rejected. The converted student left his old master. When leaving he was called aside by some of his friends, who secretly informed him that they all had the same idea of becoming Christians, but that they could find no opportunity to do so. Such instances are not unique. On the part of the government, too, the policy of extending freedom of conscience to all has led to the severing of the State's connection with Buddhism, as well as Shintoism, and equal liberty and protection are now enjoyed by all creeds, whether Japanese or foreign. Everywhere missionaries are kindly received by the people, and safely protected by the authorities. High and low, intelligent and ignorant, all alike regard Christianity as highly beneficial to the welfare of the country; and if any objection is raised against it, it is only on grounds of reason and science. The change has been not less complete than sudden. —Japan Weekly Mail, May 8th.

International Sunday-School Lesson.

BY REV. JOHN C. VAN DEVENTER.

June 27th.—Review.

Golden Text.—"And the word was made flesh and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth."—JOHN 1: 14.

CENTRAL TRUTH.—"God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have eternal life."—JOHN 3: 16.

INTRODUCTION.

The lessons which we have been studying during the past three months are fairly representative of the record which John has given us of the early part of the life of Christ. He appears to have selected the material for his Gospel for the purpose of showing the reasons for his own faith in Jesus as the Christ. We have noticed the gradual development of the faith of the disciples, the indifference of the masses to His spiritual mission, and the hostility of the rulers. Our last lesson brought us to one of the important crises of His career, and the discourse therein recorded constituted the close of His formal ministry to the Jews as a nation. From this time forward we shall find Him devoting himself more and more exclusively to the instruction of His avowed disciples in order to prepare them for the work which He should commit to them. In our review we shall follow the suggestion of three questions which we have met in the course of our study, viz., "Who art thou?" "What dost thou work?" "What sign showest thou?"

I. WHO ART THOU?—LESSONS 1, 10, 11, 12.

LESSON FIRST.—THE WORD MADE FLESH.—JOHN 1: 1-18.

"The word was made flesh, and dwelt among us."—John 1: 14.

The Gospel opens with one of the most wonderful revelations of Scripture. We are introduced into the presence chamber of the Eternal, and permitted to see the Son in the bosom of the Father. With such a beginning we are led to expect a marvellous unfolding of Divine truth, nor shall we be disappointed.

LESSON TENTH.—JESUS THE BREAD OF LIFE.—JOHN 6: 22-40.

"Lord, evermore give us this bread."—John 6: 34.

One of the keywords of this Gospel is, "Life." In this lesson Jesus sets Himself forth as the author, supporter, and ideal of this life of the soul. This life is impossible without acceptance of Christ and fellowship with Him. Our souls need constant renewing in Divine strength.

LESSON ELEVENTH.—JESUS THE CHRIST.—JOHN 7: 37-52.

"Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God."—Matt. 16: 16.

The great cause of division of popular sentiment concerning Jesus was the question, Is He the Christ? The people were looking for the One that should come, and many were impressed by the words and miracles of Jesus with the thought that perhaps He might be the promised deliverer. To the woman at the well, early in His ministry, and now, near its close, to the people at Jerusalem, Jesus revealed Himself as the Messiah, the Anointed of the LORD. The people now were unwilling to accept Him, because they had been offended by His doctrines.

LESSON TWELFTH.—JESUS AND ABRAHAM.—JOHN 8: 31-38, 44-59.

"Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day; and he saw it, and was glad."—John 8: 56.

Jesus had a still greater claim upon the faith and reverence of the people than His title of Christ, and in this lesson He distinctly declares His eternity, as existing before Abraham was born. He thus assumed the holy title, I AM, and so caused the unbelieving people to condemn Him as a blasphemer.

II. WHAT DOST THOU WORK?—LESSONS 2, 4, 5, 6.

LESSON SECOND.—THE FIRST DISCIPLES.—JOHN 1: 35-51.

"The two disciples heard him speak, and they followed Jesus."—John 1: 37.

It is always interesting to note the rise of great movements, especially when the development far exceeds the apparent promise of the germ. In this quiet scene by the banks of the Jordan, so insignificant in itself, lay folded up the entire history of the Christian Church. Then the Gospel won its first converts and secured its first preachers. We find that they went immediately to work to tell the good news to others.

LESSON FOURTH.—JESUS AND NICODEMUS.—JOHN 3: 1-18.

"Ye must be born again."—John 3: 7.

In this interview with the ruler by night, Jesus carefully reveals the spiritual nature of His mission. It seems impossible that any one could have heard that discourse and fail to be impressed with the authority of the teacher, and the atoning nature of His work. Jesus declares that birth, education, or external sanctity can give no claim to the kingdom of heaven, but that all must enter by the door of the new birth.

LESSON FIFTH.—JESUS AT THE WELL.—JOHN 4: 5-26.

"God is a Spirit; and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth."—John 4: 24.

In this lesson we have recorded an event which must have produced a profound impression upon the disciples. This discourse with the woman of Samaria served to bring light to her darkened soul, and to widen the sympathies of the disciples, as they were taught that the water of life was for the thirst of all nations.

LESSON SIXTH.—SOWING AND REAPING.—JOHN 4: 7-52.

"One soweth and another reapeth."—John 4: 37.

Jesus followed up the object lesson with a fuller exposition concerning His work and that of His disciples. Their future mission was thus early marked out for them, although it is not probable that they understood the meaning of His words until after He began to employ them in the work of evangelization.

III. WHAT SIGN SHOWEST THOU?—LESSONS 3, 7, 8, 9.

LESSON THIRD.—THE FIRST MIRACLE.—JOHN 2: 1-11.

"This beginning of miracles did Jesus in Cana of Galilee, and manifested forth his glory, and his disciples believed on him."—John 2: 11.

Note, that this miracle was wrought, not in order to win disciples, but to confirm them. It was also a gracious act of helpfulness. The presence of Jesus at the marriage feast, and His exercise of Divine power for the purpose of providing for the temporal necessities of the occasion, serve to sanctify all innocent relations and pleasures. Christ's entrance into public life, like His birth, was in the midst of the family circle.

LESSON SEVENTH.—THE NOBLEMAN'S SON.—JOHN 4: 43-54.

"Jesus saith unto him, Go thy way; thy son liveth."—John 4: 50.

This is the first miracle of healing which John has recorded, although probably not the first of the kind that he witnessed. The fact that the healing was accomplished at a distance is the apparent reason for its selection. Jesus thus proved Himself Master of life and death, without dependence upon circumstances.

LESSON EIGHTH.—JESUS AT BETHESDA.—JOHN 5: 5-18.

"Wilt thou be made whole?"—John 5: 6.

This might well be called the Parable of Bethesda, for in the manner of the healing of this man we have the Gospel pictured forth in action. The incident is of interest because it was made the pretext for the increased bitterness of opposition against Him. By His teachings concerning the Sabbath Jesus was contradicting the assertions of the Scribes, and so undermining their authority. These men were more zealous for themselves than they were for the sacred day.

LESSON NINTH.—FEEDING THE FIVE THOUSAND.—JOHN 6: 1-21.

"Jesus said unto him, I am the bread of life."—John 6: 35.

This miracle brought the popular enthusiasm up to a point where the people were ready to take Jesus to Jerusalem and declare Him their King. This feeling speedily cooled, however, when He still further explained the nature of His work and kingdom. Those who had been most ardent in His favor became most bitter as His enemies. This is the only miracle recorded by all four of the evangelists.

12. I AM.—John 8: 58.

Eyes Open.

RACHIE went off to school wondering if Aunt Amy could be right.

"I will keep my eyes open," she said to herself.

She stopped a moment to watch old Mrs. Bert, who sat inside her door binding shoes. She was just now trying to thread a needle, but it was hard work for her dim eyes.

"Why, if here isn't work for me!" exclaimed Rachie. "I never should have thought of it if it hadn't been for Aunt Amy. Stop, Mrs. Bert, let me do that for you."

"Thank you, my little lassie. My poor old eyes are worn out, you see. I can get along with the coarse work yet, but sometimes it takes me five minutes to thread my needle. And the day will come when I can't work, and then what will become of a poor old woman?"

"Mamma would say the Lord would take care of you," said Rachie very softly, for she felt that she was too little to be saying such things.

"And you can say it, too, dearie. Go on to school now. You've given me your bit of help and your comfort, too."

But Rachie had got hold of the needle-book, and was bending over it with busy fingers.

"See," she presently said, "I've threaded six needles for you to go on with. And when I come back I'll thread some more."

"May the sunlight be bright to your eyes, little one," said the old woman as Rachie skipped away.

"Come and play, Rachie," cried many voices as she drew near the play-ground. "Which side will you be on?"

But there was a little girl, with a very downcast face, sitting on the porch.

"What is the matter, Jennie?" said Rachie, going to her.

"I can't make these add up," said Jennie in a discouraged tone, pointing to a few smeary figures on her slate.

"Let me see—I did that example at home last night. Oh, you forgot to carry ten—see?"

"So I did." The example was finished, and Jennie was soon at play with the others.

Rachie kept her eyes open all day, and was surprised to find how many ways there were of doing kindnesses, which went far toward making the day happier. Try it, little girls and boys, and you will see for yourselves.

"Will ye look here, Miss Rachie?"

Bridget was sitting in the back porch, looking dolefully at a bit of paper which lay on the kitchen table she had carried out there.

"It's a letther I'm after writin' to me mother, an' it's fearin' I am she'll niver be able to rade it, because I can't rade it mesilf. Can you rade it at all, Miss Rachie? It's all the afternoon I've been at it."

Rachie tried with all her might to read poor Bridget's queer scrawl, but was obliged to give it up.

"I'll write one for you some day, Bridget," she said. "I'm going over to Jennie's to play 'I spy' now."

The fresh air and the bird songs and the soft wind made it very pleasant to be out of doors after being in school all day. And her limbs fairly ached for a good run. But she turned at the gate for another look at Bridget's woe-begone face.

"I'll do it for you now, Bridget," she said, going back.

It was not an easy task, for writing was slow work with her; but she formed each letter with painstaking little fingers, and when she had finished, felt well repaid by Bridget's warm thanks and a satisfied feeling of duty well done.

"Our Master has taken His journey
To a country that's far away."

Aunt Amy heard the cheery notes floating up the stairs, telling of the approach of the little worker.

"I've been keeping my eyes open, Aunt Amy, and there's plenty and plenty to do."
—American.

...For many years I have been accustomed to say to myself with self-application, "A great sinner, a great Saviour." As some years ago I lay on what I then thought was to be my dying bed, I thought that this would be an appropriate inscription on my tombstone. But of late I have changed it somewhat, I have altered a single word, thus, "A great sinner, a greater Saviour."—Christian Treasury.

....I will undertake to explain to anyone the final condemnation of the wicked, if he will explain to me the existence of the wicked, if he will explain why God does not cause all those to die in the cradle of whom he foresees that, when they grow up, they will lead a sinful life.—Whately.

....A question often has power far beyond the purpose or thought of the questioner. Thus it was with the question of the child-waif who found her way into a Sunday-school, and asked the superintendent, who happened to meet her at the door: "Is this the way to heaven?" That question is said to have set the superintendent at thinking about his Sunday-school; whether or not it were the way to heaven. A Sunday-school ought to be the way to heaven; but is it so in every case? Both superintendent and teacher can set scholars at thinking by wisely directed questions.—S. S. Times.

Beware of Scrofula

Scrofula is probably more general than any other disease. It is insidious in character, and manifests itself in running sores, pustular eruptions, boils, swellings, enlarged joints, abscesses, sore eyes, etc. Hood's Sarsaparilla expels all trace of scrofula from the blood, leaving it pure, enriched, and healthy.

"I was severely afflicted with scrofula, and for over a year had two running sores on my neck. Took five bottles of Hood's Sarsaparilla, and consider myself cured." C. E. LOVEJOY, Lowell, Mass.

C. A. Arnold, Arnold, Me., had scrofulous sores for seven years, spring and fall. Hood's Sarsaparilla cured him.

Salt Rheum

William Spies, Elyria, O., suffered greatly from erysipelas and salt rheum, caused by handling tobacco. At times his hands would crack open and bleed. He tried various preparations without aid; finally took Hood's Sarsaparilla, and now says: "I am entirely well."

"My son had salt rheum on his hands and on the calves of his legs. He took Hood's Sarsaparilla and is entirely cured." J. B. STANTON, Mt. Vernon, Ohio.

VOL. LVII.—No. 25. WHOLE No. 2917. NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 23, 1886. $2.65 A YEAR IN ADVANCE. No. 48 CHURCH STREET.

EDITORS: Rev. JOHN M. FERRIS, D.D. Rev. N. H. VAN ARSDALE.
ASSOCIATE EDITOR: MRS. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

THE ADDRESS of the Rev. Wm. W. Clark on the Study of the Scriptures, delivered in essentially the same form on a number of occasions during the past nine or ten months, has been strongly commended everywhere. When delivered a week or two ago at the State Sunday School Convention at Buffalo it was reported in full by a daily journal. That report has been revised by Mr. Clark and about the half of it will be found on the third page of this number. The remainder is to follow next week. The address deserves all the praise it has received and will be read with profit.

A GOVERNMENT REVENUE cutter, by order, it is said, of the Treasury Department, carries a company of priests of the Roman Church down the Bay to meet the Servia, to receive the messengers of the Pope who come bearing a cardinal's hat to the Archbishop of Baltimore. No such honor is extended by the Government to the distinguished Christian men who come to us as delegates from any of the Reformed churches of Europe. The Christians of this country do not desire it or ask for it. They seek no such recognition. It is reserved for the alien church, ruled at Rome, to seek such political distinction. It is unwise to seek or accept it, for it is offensive to the great majority of the people of the country. It is unwise for the Administration to grant it, for everybody will say what everybody believes to be true, namely, that this special recognition of the Papacy is for the sake of holding the votes of Irishmen. Irishmen are unwise in accepting such a special recognition, because it is offensive to the great body of Americans when an alien church and a class of foreign-born citizens are selected for special and uncommon attention.

RECRUITS FOR THE MINISTRY.—A few years ago the Northern Presbyterian Church became anxious because of the reduced number of young men in preparation for the ministry. The Rev. Dr. D. W. Poor was made Secretary of the Board of Education, and by wise advocacy and administration has wrought a decided improvement. But the supply still falls far short of the need; does but little more than fill the places made vacant by death. There are twelve hundred vacant pulpits in the denomination, to say nothing of the wants of the missionary Boards. Therefore Dr. Poor again pleaded earnestly with the General Assembly last month. The following paragraph is taken from his plea, because it applies to what is said and done amongst ourselves:

"It is not wise to allow matters to go on as they have been. Our Church needs a more active, a more ubiquitous leadership. We are wasting resources for want of it and weakening in places where we ought to be growing stronger. The enemies of truth and righteousness are coming in upon us like a flood and converting large portions of our country into foul marshes of moral corruption, and our standard-bearers are too few to resist them. Shall we not increase their number and improve their quality?

"Of the points presented for consideration I wish to speak specifically on one. It is the obligation resting on ministers to take special pains to provide successors for themselves adequate to the demand both in number and in quality. There is reason to fear that effort in this direction has been too much relaxed of late, under the idea that it would be interfering too much with the prerogative of the Holy Spirit, whose office it is to call men into the ministry. Indeed, we have heard the counsel publicly given, 'Don't become a minister if you can help it,' on the ground that the urgency to become one under the call of the Spirit must be irresistible. And I have known parents who carefully refrain from saying anything to their sons on the subject, lest they give an undue bias to their minds. Now, does not all this come from an exaggeration or distortion of an important truth? I, too, believe that as an ambassador of God a minister must be called and sent by his Master. No man can take this honor unto himself. But our Lord works through human instrumentality and by arguments or motives presented through the lips of His servants. I would as soon refrain from urging sinners to come to Christ, lest I interfered with the Divine election, as refrain from pressing on young men the proper motives which may induce them to enter the ministry. This work, I hold, can be so done as to prove the very drawing of Christ Himself, and result in a hearty consecration to His service. Constraint is one thing and legitimate persuasion is another. Not long ago a minister sent me the names of a number of young men whom he had enlisted in the sacred service, and who are now successful laborers in various pulpits; and just before coming here I was told by a Princeton professor of the success of special efforts with the class soon to be graduated from the college, in fully doubling of those who have resolved to enter the seminary. And why should we not be multiplying our candidates in like manner everywhere? Brethren, are we doing our duty in this particular? If we are Pauls, where are our Timothys?"

God often calls through His servants. The desire of a father or mother that a son may consecrate himself to the work of preaching the Word of Life, the thought lingering in a pastor's mind that this and that young man would be useful in the ministry, may be the means by which the Spirit of God would move those destined to noble achievements, as teachers and leaders of the Church. Our need is great and increasing, and our prayers and endeavors should be importunate.

THE NATURAL YEARLY INCREASE of the population of the United States by the excess of births over deaths is nearly 900,000 souls, and will soon be a million. It is at least an open question whether the remaining public lands in the Northwest are not needed for this increase, whether the sons of the soil will not be deprived of advantages to which they have the first right if immigrants from Europe are allowed to take up these lands. The young men and women, children of farmers, in such States as Michigan, Ohio and Wisconsin, are going now in increasing numbers into the Northwestern States and Territories in quest of cheap prairie land, which is no longer to be had even in such new States as we have named. The very interesting colonies in Dakota, Minnesota and Iowa, now asking help from us toward building churches and school buildings, are composed largely of the children of families worshipping in our churches in Michigan. And this will continue. Shall we not need during the next thirty years all of our remaining public lands for our own children? The South does not attract them. Why, we need not stop to inquire. Nor does it attract the immigrant from Europe. These Northwestern lands, limited by the sage bush desert, legitimately belong to the children of our farmers, and should be reserved for them.

The Irish Legislature.

THERE are those who read THE CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER in England, Scotland and Ireland. Therefore, we may say something chiefly for them, in regard to Home Rule.

An American wonders at the reluctance to institute a local legislature in any division of the British Empire. Accustomed to State governments with large and varied powers, combined in the United States government with specified and limited but supreme powers, he can see no reason why Ireland, or Scotland, or Wales, or England should not have the equivalent of a State legislature. His experience has taught him that the central government is strengthened and not weakened by such a division of authority. In his judgment, some such allotment of governmental power would tend to strengthen the imperial authority of Great Britain.

Our States enact laws, under the Constitution of the United States, indeed, but with entire freedom in regard to a great variety of interests. They grant incorporations, even incorporate banks with power to issue currency. They impose and collect taxes. Indeed, all the taxes, except those included in the customs and internal revenue laws, are imposed under the authority of the State governments, and nearly all corporations receive their charters from the same sources. The States also have what may be called their standing armies, consisting of uniformed, drilled militia, under officers appointed by the State. The States have their own judiciaries, elected generally by the people, and if not by them, by the State officers. In very few cases is there an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. During the Civil War it became necessary to provide a way by which certain cases could be carried from the State courts into the Supreme Court, and it was done. But the class or classes of cases which can go before the U. S. Court are limited, and are brought in, not by appeal, but an original and independent motion. For example, where the parties in contention are citizens of different States, one of New York, say, and one of New Jersey, the case can be brought before the United States courts. This carries litigation in relation to inter-State trade and commerce, etc., into the U. S. Court. But a great many of these cases are decided in and by the State courts. The States also have entire control of the constabulary within their territorial boundaries. Indeed, the great mass of legislative authority is vested in the States. And this has proved to be a source of national strength and not of weakness. To many citizens of the United States it seems that such a legislature for Ireland would be an advantage to the British Empire.

Why call such a local legislature a "parliament?" Why not call it a legislature or council or chamber of deputies? It seems to us that the name parliament should remain the distinguishing title of the imperial legislative body. Why should not Ireland, while having a local legislature, be also represented in Parliament, as the States of this country are represented in Congress?

Mr. Matthew Arnold, just before he left England for his present visit to this country, sent a communication to the London Times, in which he said that the people of the United States refused to grant a separate Congress to the South. But he ought to have presented the whole case and to have said that by local State governments, by State legislatures, with the large powers we have outlined, the South had almost unlimited Home Rule, with no interference from the North.

Our English friends have no reason to wonder that a great many persons in the United States sympathize with the endeavor to establish a legislature in Ireland, endowed with large powers.

But there is also something to be said in regard to what is now done and has been done for some time on this side of the Atlantic. Large sums of money are openly raised here to influence the elections in Great Britain. That is certainly contrary to the past policy of this nation, and is establishing a precedent which may be followed with injurious results. If the people of the United States can engage in efforts intended to act directly on elections in Great Britain, they cannot complain if hereafter, when they consider it to be for their interest, the nobility, or the manufacturers, or the ship owners or builders, or the bankers of any European power, shall openly engage in endeavors to control the elections in the United States. The power of the institutions of the United States has been so great as to be resistless, but it has been wholly the power of example. Non-interference in the affairs of all other nations has been the law of our policy. Irishmen for some years have disregarded what was considered to be the settled policy of the United States and what a very large proportion, perhaps a majority, of the people of this country believe to be the true policy to-day. Irishmen have been allowed to break down our national principle in this matter because politicians of both parties desire their votes. We believe the interference with British elections to be unwise and anticipate injurious results from it.

Religion at Home and in Business.

IN reply to a letter of sympathy occasioned by the accidental death of a gentleman, formerly of this city, a near relative wrote the lines which follow:

"All of the circumstances were unusually sad, and the loss, from every standpoint, was such as to be keenly felt; but no words can convey the measure of satisfaction which has come to all of us who knew him at home and in close business relations, from the holiness of his character. He has taught me, as nothing else has, the possibility of walking with God, and at the same time entering into the details of every-day business life."

In these days when religion is so frequently and so widely divorced from home-life and business, such a testimony is well worth publishing, nameless though it be, but real and noble, and full of encouragement to those who are trying to obey the Apostolic rule, "Not slothful in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord."

The English Swedenborgians on the Revision.

THE General Conference of the New Church, the largest representative body in Great Britain of the receivers of the writings of Swedenborg, took the following action at its last session in London:

The President having referred in his report to the completed revision of the Authorized Version of the sacred Scriptures,

"Resolved, That this Conference, while gratefully acknowledging the learning and devotion of the scholars who have effected this revision, believes that the New Church must still look forward to the preparation of a version by students instructed in the doctrines of the internal sense of the Word, and thus competent to reproduce its letter in such form as shall constitute the genuine basis, firmament and continent, of the Divine Wisdom within."

If this body succeeds in getting a new version such as it speaks of, it will be only a sectarian affair and have no circulation among others. What is required is an exact reproduction of the sense, and so far as possible, the form of the original, but if the translator is biassed by his doctrinal views, much more if it be these that prompt him to the work, he must needs fail in an impartial rendering.

A Song of the Night.

[The beautiful lines below were sent to me by Captain Walter Bicker but a few days before his death, with the remark that, "copies of these lines have been printed in the hope that they may bring resignation and comfort to some of the sorrowing ones."—W. H.]

O CHRISTIAN, murmur not,
Though earthly joys depart!
Remember who ordains thy painful lot;
Oh, trust His heart.

Think of the crown of thorn,
Think of the woeful tree,
Think of the shame, the mockery and scorn,
He bore for thee.

See the red drops that start
From feet and hands and side;
Think of the bitter cry, the breaking heart;
For thee He died.

Trust Him through every loss,
Trust Him whate'er befall;
That loving heart that bore the torturing cross
Disposes all.

In sorrow's darkest day
Embrace His blessed will;
Though He should take Thy precious things away,
Oh, trust Him still!

Thou knowest not the end,
Thou canst not see the way;
To Him the path, and whither it shall tend,
Are clear as day.

Be sure His will is right,
Be sure He loveth still;
He leads thee upward through the storm and night
To Zion's hill.

Then, when thy task is o'er,
When toil and sorrow cease,
Thou shalt find entrance on that blissful shore
Where all is peace. ELLEN WONNACOTT.

"Old Colony" Papers.

TIMELY TOPICS.

WHAT DO NEWSPAPER READERS WANT. . . . GENTLEMANLY GAMBLING. . . . A CHAMPION OF POLYGAMY. . . . LAWYER MORALITY.

DURING the last few weeks the ecclesiastical convocations of the Presbyterians (North and South), the Congregationalists, the Baptists, the Reformed Churches (German and our own) and others, representing many millions of church-goers, have been held. It is to be supposed that a large proportion of these constituencies would be interested in a daily abstract of what their leaders and legislators were doing, and that the daily papers would devote a considerable space to these reports. Instead of that, in most cases not a line has appeared, and in others an occasional fragmentary reference has been made, chiefly to such things as the Woodrow trial or the defalcations discovered in one or two Boards, where the taste for scandal or the hatred of religion might be gratified.

The omission certainly cannot be attributed to a want of space, for the morning papers have devoted column after column to the races and base ball games, to the College and West Point anniversaries, to the fortunes of the "boodle" aldermen, and to the mean and atrocious persecution of the President on his wedding trip. And besides this, they have reported in detail every neighborhood scandal and unclean development, every suicide and murder and assault and mésalliance. "Keyhole journalism" has never been more enterprising, nor newspaper servage more copious. How long shall those who "delight not in iniquity but rejoice in the truth patiently consent to be ignored? or, is it true, which these papers say, that there are not enough such to make it an object to cater to their tastes; and that the religious classes are best pleased in their secret hearts by what panders to a low and depraved sentiment.

The N. Y. Tribune is extremely pessimistic in view of the obstructions laid in the way of betting at Jerome Park, and at Sheepshead and Monmouth, by the enforcement of the laws, and thinks "it is hard to see how the interests of the turf can stand such a blow." It draws a broad distinction between "wagers among gentlemen under the auspices of associations managed by gentlemen," and "betting in its vicious forms." This indicates a singular confusion of mind, alike on what constitutes morality and on what constitutes a gentleman. And it has a snobbish sound, as coming from the journal "founded by Horace Greeley."

Gambling is the great and growing vice of this age, capturing and corrupting almost every avenue of life into which it can insinuate itself. The race-track is its grand summer school. There the appetite is acquired by multitudes, and by classes which are otherwise comparatively little exposed to its exciting temptations. It is well known that women are among the maddest of the betting crowds. It is a mere pretence, too, that the gambling is controlled by gentlemen. The reason frankly given by perhaps the foremost "turf" man in this country for his retirement and the sale of his racing stable is, that "meeting by meeting, the standard of American turf morals has fallen lower and lower....The jockey's tricks and the pool seller's influence count more than honest training or capable horse-flesh." All his efforts to remedy this state of thing having failed, his "self-respect" obliges him to get out of the slough of despond.

But even were it otherwise on certain "Parks," we cannot consistently or safely exempt the "gentlemanly" gambler, while we hunt down the humbler devotee of the cock-fight or the policy shop. How can we expect our police to close the gaming "hells" in town, if we permit these open air gehennas,—which might well be called the Devil's Camp-Meetings. It is "well enough," Mr. Tribune, "that the issue should be fought out now." And the authorities are right in seeing to it that judgment begins just where crime is most public and most popular.

Another startling case of moral obliquity, or obfuscation, is Mr. George Tichnor Curtis's published argument in behalf of Apostle Snow, in which he not only defends but eulogizes Mormon polygamy. He argues for it on the ground that the relation is "voluntary on the part of the Mormon women." The moral virtues of these women and of these communities is declared to be superior to those of any equal number of people anywhere. He vouches for their loyalty and law-abiding character, and pronounces that "no better code of political morals for the ground that it covers, was ever formulated by a human pen." And he demands that the "persecution" of the polygamists shall cease because the practice is with them a religious belief, and a case which comes under the holy claim of "religious liberty and the rights of conscience," to be classed with that of the Waldenses, the Quakers in Massachusetts, and the victims of Alva in the Netherlands.

It is worth while to remember that this same Curtis could never see anything wrong or oppressive in American Slavery, and was the U. S. Commissioner at Boston who, in 1851, returned the fugitive Thomas Sims to his master.

Or, is this simply a case which involves the whole question of lawyer morality? It has become so customary to hear advocates commit themselves to the side which offers a retaining fee, and endorsing the cause of their clients with the weight of their personal judgment and character, that one never knows how to take these utterances, whether as those of the lawyer or of the man. Something, of course, may be credited to the heat of conflict in a court-room, or to a generous pity for a poor wretch against whom the whole world seems arrayed. But a man must not lie, to save either himself or his client. And he does lie when he stands before a jury and vouches for the innocence of another, whom he knows or has good reason to believe to be guilty.

I do not say that a lawyer should not undertake a cause which he does not believe a just one,—though I am confident that the knowledge of this being a man's rule and principle would, in the long run, prove weightier with juries than all his eloquence or learning. This was the reason why the retaining of Theodore Frelinghuysen used to be almost equivalent to a verdict in New Jersey. But every accused person has a right to have the evidence and the law upon his side forcibly presented and favorably construed, and this involves the services of a skilled spokesman. If the devil himself were on trial, he would be entitled to counsel—supposing that he were not himself an abler lawyer than any member of the bar. But we should not envy the man's fee, who should manifest much enthusiasm for the task, or who should pursue tactics which would satisfy his client.

I am afraid that there is a distinct code of morality, if not a distinct quality of conscience, current with each class of people, from that which belongs to man as man. There is a commercial code, a society code, a professional code for lawyers, doctors, editors, and even clergymen. Politicians have a politic conscience. Workingmen have been showing their moral confusedness on a startling scale, of late. Railroad managers and investors, the various "exchanges" and "operators," all have carefully padded that part of the ethical saddle which galls their weak places. Outside of these relations men may recognize and try to observe a broader morality,—though there are evidences that the general moral tone of modern life is steadily deteriorating under this insidious influence. A conditional morality is itself an immorality, and the "State of Denmark" cannot be expected to be any stronger under pressure than the "something rotten" in its underpinning. I am reminded, as a glaring illustration of this adjustable morality, of the Highlander who refused a bribe of thirty thousand pounds to betray the hiding-place of Prince Charles Edward, and was shortly afterwards transported for stealing a cow worth thirty shillings!

The fact that a criminal's counsel is expected to express confidence in his client, by his manner if not by his words, and to lay aside all scruples and resort to every trick to get him off, is having the effect of driving almost every decent lawyer out of that branch of practice. There was a day when the leaders of the N. Y. bar were constantly found in the criminal courts—men like Charles O'Conor, James T. Brady, John McKeon, Ogden Hoffman, David Graham, and James R. Whiting. To-day the favorite counsel are generally men whose personal and professional character, and even their educational advantages, are of the lowest order.

When the object is simply to win, and the criterion is simply success, and not the vindication of truth and righteousness, the profession of the law becomes terribly degrading to those engaged in it, and repulsive to those outside. And the more high-minded members, who prize their own reputation as well as that of the profession, cannot be too scrupulous as to their own conduct, as well as vigilant in disavowing the corruptions both of the bench and of the bar. There is a sound basis of truth and right-mindedness, along with its eccentricity and "foolishness to men," in the following advertisement which appeared recently in an English provincial newspaper: "Wanted, a God-fearing lawyer, a true son of light, to conduct a law case. Write Box —, Plymouth."

How to Study and Teach the Scriptures.

BY REV. WM. W. CLARK.

An Address delivered at the N. Y. State Sunday-School Convention, held at Buffalo, June 8–10, and reported by the Buffalo Express.

THE motto of this Association shall be our text: "The Bible by the hand of the living teacher to every child in the State."

It is one thing to have the Bible in the hand, and quite another thing to know how to handle it. The Word of God is called by Paul "the sword of the spirit." Anyone can hold a sword, but only an expert can use it skilfully. The task assigned me today is to show you "how to study and teach the Scriptures," how to wield this sword of the spirit. Study comes before teaching and is the foundation for teaching. As Paul writes to Timothy, "Study to show thyself approved unto God, rightly dividing, (or, according to the Revision, handling aright) the word of truth." This should be the aim and desire of every Sunday school teacher—to handle aright God's Holy Word. And this may be done by bearing in mind and believing with the heart a few general principles relative to the Bible. These, then, are the points we will consider in their order: "The Author," "The Outline," "Subject," "Purpose," "Internal Divisions," "Teacher."

FIRST.—THE AUTHOR.

Who wrote this book? This is the most important matter for us to settle ere we study and teach the Scriptures. The great theological question of the day is concerning the character of revelation, whether the Bible be wholly inspired, or partly inspired, or not inspired at all. Even among theologians there is a great difference of opinion; and as these opinions are ventilated in the secular and religious press it is our duty to look into the matter deeply, that we may not only be convinced ourselves, but be able to persuade others also.

We believe in the full verbal inspiration of Holy Writ, that the Scriptures as they originally came from the hands of the writers were in truth "God breathed."

As students and teachers of these oracles we must know whether our faith rests upon the wisdom of men or on the authority of God. Paul writes to the Thessalonians, "For this cause thank we God without ceasing, because when ye received the word of God from us, ye received it not as the word of men but as it is in truth, the word of God." Peter writes, "Holy men of old spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," and he also declares, "This Scripture must be fulfilled which the Holy Ghost by the mouth of David spake concerning Judas." David himself said, "The Spirit of the Lord spake by me and His word was on my tongue."

If this be true in relation to the spoken word, it is especially so in relation to the written word. This is declared in 2 Timothy 3: 16, "All Scripture (i. e., every writing) is inspired of God." If all the writings are not inspired, who is to decide what portion is of God and what of man? Each reader may cut and carve, accept and reject as he chooses, and in the end nothing but threads and patches of the Divine book will remain. There was a minister in New England who thought he knew how to draw the line, and one of his parishioners was in the habit of marking every portion of the Bible which the learned preacher said was not inspired. After each service he took his penknife and cut out these passages. The Old Testament miracles came out one by one, some times an entire chapter, and then a whole book would be removed, and after a few years of this sort of work the Bible was shown the minister with its mutilated pages and ragged stubs. "Give it to me" said the preacher, in a tone of wonder and excitement. "No," was the reply, "I will hold it myself and thank God I have the covers left."

Bear in mind that it is the record that is inspired and not every utterance. Satan was not inspired to say to Adam, "Thou shalt not surely die," for it was a falsehood; but Moses was inspired to write it. Ananias was not led by God "to lie to the Holy Ghost," but Luke was inspired to give us the record. Peter was not inspired to deny the Lord, but he was inspired to make the confession as to His divinity. The record of the former is as much inspired as the record of the latter.

The Old Testament testimony is superabounding. Mark the utterances of the prophets, "Hear the word of the Lord which came unto Isaiah," "Jeremiah," and "expressly unto Ezekiel the priest." This phrase, "the word of the Lord," or its equivalent is used 100 times in Jeremiah, 60 times in Ezekiel, 50 times in Amos, 24 times in Malachi. All the minor prophets sound the same note. It is like the roar of heaven's artillery all along the line, "thus saith the Lord." In the New Testament the marvellous differences in the Gospel and the wonderful peculiarities of every epistle are to be accounted for by being attributed, not to the weak and finite minds of the human penman, but to the omniscient mind of an infinite God. Nor does this belief interfere with the human element in inspiration. These men were not like brass trumpets through whom God spoke, but they wrote in language which accorded with their education and temperament, and yet they were so led by the Spirit that God alone is responsible for what they have written.

Students and teachers, hold fast to this, that the Bible not only contains the Word of God, but that it is the Word of God. Canon Ryle forcibly says: "Give me the plenary verbal theory with all its difficulties rather than doubt. I accept the difficulties and humbly wait for their solution; but while I wait, I am standing on a rock."

"How precious is the Book Divine
By inspiration given;
Bright as a lamp its doctrines shine
To guide our way to heaven."

SECOND.—THE OUTLINE.

Paul enjoins Timothy to "hold fast the form (outline) of sound words." And he further says that God hath given us "the spirit of a sound mind." If this be exercised in the pursuit of Scriptural wisdom, much knowledge will be gained. The Bible may be studied like the globe. The latter has its two hemispheres; each hemisphere three continents; every continent has its countries; every country its divisions into states, counties, cities and towns. So the Bible has its two Testaments, each Testament three great divisions—the historic, poetic and prophetic portions in the Old Testament; the historic, doctrinal and prophetic portions in the New Testament; these divisions are subdivided into chapters and verses.

We should seek to learn the general scope of the Bible as a whole, of each Testament, every division, and particularly the aim and outline of the individual books. As we take up each portion, let us inquire, What was the design of God in writing this particular book? For what special purpose was this Gospel, epistle, or prophecy written? And we often find the key to the book in the first verse. (See Isaiah 1: 1; Matthew 1: 1; John 1: 1; Revelation 1: 1.)

"To know the Word, perceive its plan,
To feel its force and learn its scope
Is the believer's precious hope:
Not given to the natural man.
O, be the blessings truly thine,
That in thee God's own light shall shine."

Genesis is the book of beginnings; Exodus treats of redemption; Leviticus of priesthood; Numbers of wilderness journeyings, and Joshua of warfare. In the other historic books there is also a leading thought. Take the prophecies. Isaiah treats of Judah and Jerusalem, as its first verse declares, while Hosea is burdened on account of backsliding Israel. Dr. John Hall once said to a company of students, that the man who would open up the hidden beauties of the Minor Prophets would be doing for the Bible what Livingstone and Stanley had done for the world in opening up Central Africa. There is no study that we have enjoyed more than this, taking each prophet by himself and endeavoring to obtain a clear idea of the scope and aims of his prophecy. In the study of the New Testament it is essential to grasp the outline of each book. Matthew's aim is to present Jesus as the Messiah of the Jews, the son of David and of Abraham, the fulfiller of the law and prophets. Mark portrays the Lord as the servant who came "not to be ministered unto, but to minister;" the meek and lowly one who went about doing good. Luke presents Jesus as the Son of Man, tracing His lineage beyond Abraham to Adam and setting forth His compassion, love and sympathy. But John depicts Him as the Son of God, describing His divine glories, as Creator, Redeemer and Judge.

Matthew is Jewish, Mark is Roman, Luke is universal, and John is spiritual. The characteristic differences of these four books should be carefully studied, instead of trying to make "a harmony;" for only in this way can we obtain the mind of God in this four-fold record of His Son.

The outline and scope of each epistle it is very necessary to understand before we can either read or teach intelligently. Look at Ephesians for example. It contains six chapters. The first three are occupied with our spiritual blessings, the last three with our responsibilities. Paul, after showing how high and exalted our calling is, exhorts us to walk worthy of it (chap. 4: 1), and then goes on to tell how to walk; after which he clothes us with the whole armor of God and tells us to stand. We who are sitting in heavenly places are told to walk in earthly places and then to fight against the wiles of the devil. This is the outline of the Ephesians. Every other epistle as well as the Revelation has its own peculiar theme, which we should attempt to comprehend ere we can derive the fullest benefit in its study. Miles Coverdale, in his preface to the English Bible (1535), says: "It will greatly help you to understand Scripture if you mark not only what is written, but of whom and to whom; with what words, at what time, where, to what intent, with what circumstances, considering that which goes before and that which follows." Remember that if you can.

Our Church.

General Synod of the Reformed Church in America.

EIGHTIETH REGULAR SESSION, NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., 1886

Tenth Day—Friday, June 11th.

MORNING, 9 O'CLOCK.—President Drury in the chair.

The Committee on Overtures, through Rev. Theo. S. Brown, reported, recommending a constitutional amendment to the effect that "six ministers and six elders, when regularly convened, shall constitute a quorum of the Particular Synods for the transaction of business,' a majority of the Classes having voted in favor of it; also dispensations to various applicants.

The committee recommend that the word "no" in the clause of the Van Benschoten Bequest be omitted, which reads "the approaching millennium, the commencement of which may be (no) further distant than the present living," since it was not in the original draft of the Bequest; also that the rule requiring the Particular Synods to appoint committees on Church Extension and Church Visitation be rescinded; also that each Classis be directed at its coming fall session to take the subject of supplying vacant fields with laborers into serious consideration, and if possible devise some remedy for this great evil.

The committee recommend that the following question be submitted to the Classes for their action: Shall Section VI., Article 2, of our Constitution be amended so as to add to it the words "Foreign Missionary Classes may grant license in such cases as are contemplated in this section without a dispensation from the General Synod."

The Classis of New Brunswick asks Synod to adopt the following: "Resolved, That the Classis of Arcot be permitted and advised to initiate such measures as shall tend to bind together the churches of the Presbyterian polity in India." The committee recommend that this resolution be adopted as the expression of Synod, and that we assure our missionaries in India that when the Providence of God shall indicate that the time has come for such a Union Church of Christ in India, composed of those holding the Reformed faith and Presbyterian polity, the General Synod will consent to the union of the Classis of Arcot with that body.

The committee had received a communication on the temperance question, which sets forth the evils attending the traffic in intoxicating drink, and urges the Synod to make a declaration that it is the duty of Christians to cast their votes so as to outlaw and suppress the traffic both by constitutional amendment and by the election of officers favorable to total prohibition. The committee says, The General Synod has so often expressed its sentiments in favor of temperance and urged upon ministers and all Christian people the duty of exerting their best influence in its favor, that any further words seem needless; yet because of the extreme importance of the subject we would reiterate and emphasize these deliverances and press the matter anew upon the heart and conscience of our Church. As for pledging the Synod and the Church to any particular form of action, we deem it inexpedient and calculated to divide rather than to concentrate and make effective our efforts in this good cause. They therefore recommend that our ministers be urged to give special prominence to this subject in their public ministrations, and that all Christians, both by example and effort, do their utmost to restrain the evils of intemperance. Especially do they recommend that most careful work be done among the young, so that they may be fortified against the temptations which so constantly surround them.

The Classes of Westchester, Passaic, South Long Island and Illinois, overture the General Synod to establish a fund in connection with the Board of Domestic Missions, with a view to raise the inadequate salaries of pastors to at least $1,000 per annum, with the use of a parsonage, such fund being apportioned according to certification and recommendation of Classis, and collections therefor being authorized and recommended by the General Synod in addition to those now taken for the benevolent Boards of the Church. The committee being heartily in sympathy with the spirit and objects of these united overtures, and feeling their importance, recommended, in order that the whole subject may have the thorough consideration which it richly deserves, it be referred to a committee of three ministers and two elders to report at the next General Synod.

The committee reported that two papers had been placed in their hands on the subject of union with the Reformed Church in the United States.

1. The Classis of Philadelphia "prays the General Synod to entertain with kind and careful consideration any overtures that may come from the Reformed Church in the United States, or from the lower judicatories of our own Church, looking toward closer ecclesiastical union."

2. The Classis of Monmouth sends the following resolution:

Resolved, That the General Synod be and hereby is requested to do all in its power to bring together in organized unity the Reformed churches of the New World, that from the Atlantic to the Pacific the continent may be girded with churches upholding the tried and unchangeable doctrines of the Heidelberg Catechism consolidated as one body and animated by one spirit.

The committee say: The subject thus brought before us involves the careful consideration of so many intricate questions, that we do not attempt anything like a final expression of the sentiment of the General Synod. We have neither the facts nor the time to formulate them. That the General Synod will treat with careful consideration any overture from the Reformed Church in the United States looking to such union, we well know; that there is at present a strong sentiment in our own Church for such union is evident. But that an organic union would be best for them and for us and for the Church at large can not be asserted until the whole question has been most carefully studied. That these necessary facts may be brought before the Church we recommend that a committee of five, three ministers and two laymen, be appointed by the President, who shall be authorized to confer with any similar committee from the Reformed Church in the United States; to consider carefully the legal bearing of such a union upon our own church property, and present their conclusions, with any other information they may obtain, to the next General Synod.

Inasmuch as it is understood that Dr. Chamberlain is expecting to pass through Great Britain on his return to India about the time of the meeting of the Presbyterian Assemblies in 1887:

Resolved, That Rev. Jacob Chamberlain, D.D., be commissioned to present to such of the Presbyterian General Assemblies as he may be able to visit the fraternal greetings of this body, and to draw their attention to the unanimous action taken by this body in favor of organic union on mission fields of those holding the Reformed faith with the Presbyterian polity, in the hope that similar permissive action may be taken by their respective bodies, authorizing their missions in India to take part in such a union.

Adopted.

The following committees recommended in the above report were appointed by the Chair: On Sustentation Plan: Ministers, M. H. Hutton, E. J. Rank, J. W. Beardslee; Elders, H. D. Van Orden, D. B. Griswold. On Union with the German Reformed Church: Ministers, W. J. R. Taylor, J. A. De. Baun, J. Elmendorf; Elders, H. W. Bookstaver and E. J. Miller.

The Committee on the Board of Direction, Elder P. S. Danforth, Chairman, reported concerning the salaries of Professors Woodbridge, De Witt and Demarest, recommending the adoption of the following: Resolved, That the salaries of Professors Woodbridge, De Witt and Demarest for the present year be $2,500 each, payable quarterly, with a residence.

It is represented that the claims upon the Disabled Ministers' Fund are greater than it can meet, the committee submit the following resolution:

That this Synod recommend the "Disabled Ministers' Fund" to the churches, with the hope that the friends in the coming year may be largely increased, and that ministers and consistories are requested to urge their people to give with a liberal hand to a fund which commends itself to every member of the Church.

In view of the general excitement and anxiety prevailing in relation to the management of funds of many organizations of our land, your committee take pleasure in commending the plan which your Board of Direction has for some years pursued, namely, that of making all payments by check, even of the smallest amounts. All these checks are signed by the Treasurer and countersigned by the President of the Board, and both parties keep a check book. These books are submitted to the Auditing Committee for examination each year.

Adopted.

The Committee on Entertainment, Rev. J. G. Smart, Chairman, reported:

In view of the fact that no invitation had been extended to the Synod for its entertainment next year; that there is great inequality in the distribution of expenses by the present method; that there are increasing difficulties attendant upon the entertainment of Synod at the expense of a single community, therefore,

Resolved 1. That the Synod hereafter provide for the expense of entertainment by an apportionment upon the Classes.

2. That the sum of two cents per communicant be the basis of said apportionment.

3. That the Classes be directed to pay the sum collected to the Treasurer of the General Synod, and that it be disbursed by him at the rate of $1 per day to each delegate for such time only as he shall be present at the session of Synod.

4. That the invitation of the Consistory of the Reformed church at Catskill, to occupy their church edifice during the sittings of the next Synod, and the offer of the Prospect Park Hotel to entertain the entire Synod at $1 per member per day, be accepted, and that the allowance to the members of Synod be only to such as are entertained at said hotel.

5. That delegates from non-contributing Classes be not allowed a share in this entertainment fund.

6. That the Rev. Evert Van Slyke, D.D., and Elder W. H. Van Orden, be a committee to perfect the arrangements at Catskill, N. Y., for the entertainment of the next session of Synod.

Adopted.

The Committee on the Board of Publication, Rev. Jacob Van Der Meulen, Chairman, reported that there had been referred to them the Thirty-second Annual Report of the Board of Publication. This report mentions gratifying tokens of growing interest in its work, and exhibits larger contributions during the year. The kindness of Rev. John B. Thompson, D.D., is acknowledged in donating to the Board his own half of the copyright of the hymn-book "Christian Praise;" and by purchase of the other half the Board now owns the entire copyright. S. B. Schieffelin, Esq., has added to former gifts to the Board stereotype plates of a valuable book called "An Index of the Bible." The Board has issued reprints, including more than one thousand copies of the Heidelberg Catechism, one thousand copies of Psalms for responsive reading, two thousand copies of "Christian Praise," and one thousand copies of Doctrinal Standards. The Sower and Mission Monthly is reported to have a circulation of ten thousand. The report alludes to the perils of Immigration, Romanism, Mormonism, Intemperance, Socialism, Unconsecrated Wealth, and a pernicious literature, and urges the importance of sustaining the Board in its efforts to meet these evils.

The Board's assets amount to $16,261.11, a gain of more than $1,000 over last year, and it has no liabilities. The committee submitted the following resolutions:

1. The Synod is grateful to God for the growing prosperity of the Board of Publication, congratulates its officers and members, and commends their diligence and fidelity.

2. That the Sower and Mission Monthly, as tending to develop activity in the Master's service, should be introduced into every one of our households.

3. That we suggest to pastors and consistories to aid the Board by securing from every congregation collections and donations, and by purchasing books, catechisms and other supplies for the Sabbath-schools from its depository.

4 That a special call is hereby made on those churches that did not this year contribute to the Board to fill the blank column next year, even though able to give but a very small collection.

5. That the Board is requested to publish such works as the exigencies of the times, in its judgment, demand in the interest of doctrinal truth, to meet the call of the churches upon it for such literature, as far as its means may warrant.

Adopted.

The Committee on Education, Rev. M. H. Hutton, D.D., Chairman, reported that they had received a communication relating to the Northwestern Academy, the twentieth annual report of the Council of Hope College, and the fifty-fourth annual report of the Board of Education.

In respect to the Northwestern Academy, the committee calls the attention of Synod to its importance, and urges the community in its vicinity to renewed efforts and sacrifices to secure its proper endowment, and presents it to the careful consideration of churches and individuals, and recommends the appointment of Rev. Messrs. A. J. Hutton, D. Cole, J. G. Van Slyke, W. R. Davis and the Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Education as a committee to give such aid to the Financial Agent as may be in their power; that the Rev. L. Dykstra be commended to the churches as the Financial Agent, and that the attention of the Board of Education be directed to the needs and importance of the Academy, and that it be recommended to benefit by their funds to an amount as much as, in the judgment of the Board, the state of their treasury will admit.

In relation to Hope College they report the changes that have taken place in the Faculty, and an enrollment of 140 students in the Preparatory department and 35 in the Collegiate. If President Scott shall succeed in securing the endowment of the two professorships of $20,000 each, and $10,000 for the library and museum, the Council report that they would consider the finances in a fairly satisfactory condition for the present. The committee commend with more confidence than ever, this now promising institution to the fostering care of the Church and of the Board of Education.

Concerning the Board of Education; it now has on the roll 53 students. The receipts show an increase of $1,100 above those of last year; the expenses of administration have been reduced, and the Treasurer, at his own suggestion, has given the Board bonds for the faithful performance of his duties.

The committee recommend the following resolutions:

1. That Synod, as always, commend this Board to the liberality of the churches, and join in their appeal for young men to overtake that great work of evangelization which threatens so far to outrun the supply of men to conduct it.

2. That Synod recommend the usual observance of the last Thursday of January as a day of special prayer for theological seminaries, colleges and schools.

3. That the Board of Education have authority to recommend to the Trustees of Rutgers College such students for the Van Bunschooten Fund as, upon consultation, may be found advisable.

Adopted.

The Committee on the Widows' Fund, the Rev. Geo. J. Van Neste, Chairman, reported that there was a balance in the treasury May 1st, 1885, of $4,746.65, and that the receipts in annual dues and from interest were $4,735.72. There has been paid annuitants $4,849.56. There was an increase of the principal fund during the year of $1,617 80, making a total on hand of $67,873.37. The committee, after explaining the objects of this fund and its advantages, and alluding to the fact that less than fourscore of our ministers have a personal benefit in it, and that but 121 of our churches contributed to its aid during the past year, submitted the following resolutions:

1. That for a better understanding of the objects and conditions of "The Widows' Fund" and of "The Disabled Ministers' Fund," special attention of pastors and churches is called to the plan of each Fund as found in the Digest on pages 85-91.

2. That all contributors, when sending their gifts to the Treasurer of General Synod, are urgently requested to designate by the full specific title, whether they are intended for "The Widows' Fund" or "The Disabled Ministers' Fund."

3. That in "The Widows' Fund" the ministers of our Church have a safe and durable investment, by the annual payment of $20 or less, for themselves and families, especially in circumstances of greatest need.

4. That as a matter of the highest style of beneficence our churches are called to liberal benefactions for those who have served the Church of our Lord Jesus Christ in her vital and noblest work.

Adopted.

The President named as the Committee on Pastoral Letter, Rev. W. J. R. Taylor, D.D., Rev. J. H. Oerter, D.D., and Elder John Duncan.

Rev. T. Walker Jones, Chairman of the Committee on Systematic Beneficence, reported that they had carefully examined the list of contributions, with the following result: 274 churches contributed to the Board of Education $7,330 30; 387 churches to the Board of Domestic Missions $28,582.22; 424 churches to the Board of Foreign Missions

$72,354 64; 230 churches to the Church Building Fund $12,212 55; 153 churches to the Board of Publication $1,674.69; 166 churches to the Widows' Fund $2,022.33; 172 churches to the Disabled Ministers' Fund $2,230.15.

The committee recognized the need not only of giving to all the Boards and Funds recommended by the General Synod, but also of giving systematically, so that each Board and Fund shall receive its full measure of merited offerings. A large percentage of the churches were reported as having contributed nothing during the year to either the Boards or Funds. The following resolutions were recommended and adopted with the report:

1. That the ministers and churches which have contributed to all our Boards and Funds find encouragement in the success which has attended their efforts, and that during the coming year they strive to reach even a higher mark and secure larger gifts for the worthy charities of our Church.

2. That the ministers and churches that have not during the past year remembered each of our Boards and Funds with at least one collection, be affectionately urged to show their love and loyalty to our denominational work by supporting all our charitable agencies.

On motion it was

Resolved, That this Synod heartily commends the national work of the American Sunday-School Union in the preparation and diffusion of Christian literature for the young, and in its missionary services among the scattered and increasing new settlements of the far distant parts of the republic.

Dr. Denis Wortman offered the following, which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the Synod acknowledges with most grateful appreciation the courtesy of the consistory and congregation of the First Reformed Church of New Brunswick in the use of their historic church, and renders most cordial thanks to them and to the pastor and families of the Second Reformed Church and other churches of the city, as well as to the President and faculty of Rutgers College and the Professors of the Theological Seminary, who have so heartily welcomed us, for the generous hospitality of their homes which has given us so great enjoyment during this protracted session.

Resolved, That our thanks be tendered to the organist and choir of this church for the excellent music rendered on several occasions; to the Postmaster of New Bruswick for his care in our behalf, and to the officials of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company for their many courtesies and accommodations.

After attention to some closing details, and a few parting words by President Drury, the Rev. E. B. Coe was invited to lead the Synod in prayer, after which the doxology was sung and the Synod was dismissed with the benediction by the President.

....OUR FOREIGN MISSIONS.—The Board received into its Treasury in May a total sum of $8,232.06. Of this amount $4,976 30 are a special donation from the Woman's Board (including the "Nagasaki Fund" so long held by it) for the purpose of a building for the Jonathan Sturges Seminary for girls at Nagasaki, Japan. There was also received the sum of $967.22 in response to the special appeal of Rev. R. G. Strong for the removal of the debt. Deducting these two items, there are left $2,288 54 from the usual sources and for the general work of the Board. This is $400 less than last year.

Up to the 19th inst., the special appeal has brought $1,198.68, and has, to that extent, lessened the necessity for borrowing. It has been found necessary, however, to borrow $3,000 this month.

In order to avoid further additions in this direction before November 1st, the Treasury will need to receive $26,500,—somewhat more than twice as much as the receipts for the same period last year. These are the most trying months of the year, when large payments have to be made, while the contributions are very far below the average. It is at this time that the bulk of the Board's loans are made, and the great risk incurred of a large permanent addition to the debt. The interest on the loans thus contracted is also a loss to the Church and to the work. This amount, if it could have been saved last year, would have sufficed to place a new missionary family in the field, or to support 20 native helpers. Is it worth while for the Church to incur such a loss?

The General Synod invited the careful attention of Classes and churches to this matter; especially those that are largely in the country. The Board would earnestly repeat and emphasize the invitation. Due atttention given to it would obviate much anxiety and save much needless expense.

COR. SEC.

[NOTE.—It is proper to add at the present time to the Secretary's statement a few facts in regard to the financial management of the affairs of the Board.

An important part of the financial administration is the procuring of bills of exchange to be remitted to the Missions. The rule of the Board, never departed from and on file with the bankers, is that the Secretary shall notify the Finance Committee that such and such bills are needed for the month. The Finance Committee writes the order, gives it to the Secretary and the Secretary delivers it to the Treasurer. In no other way can the Treasurer or any other person obtain a bill of exchange for which the Board can be held responsible. The business passes through the hands of the Secretary, the Finance Committee and the Treasurer, and must do so.

In regard to borrowing money: The Treasurer is authorized by a rule drawn by a competent attorney and on the records for years, to borrow "by and with the advice and consent of the Finance Committee," such amounts as may be necessary. The custom observed for over twenty years and perhaps longer has given still larger security and has been so long observed as to amount to a regulation. The Treasurer at the monthly meeting of the Executive Committee not only presents a report of the receipts and expenditures of the preceding month, but makes also a statement of the wants of the following month, often of three or four months, and this statement almost invariably leads to a series of questions and some discussion, so that the Executive Committee also knows the condition of and the maturing demands on the Treasury. The Synod this month has resolved that the loans shall be countersigned by the President or Secretary of the Board. That order can be readily obeyed and will be cheerfully; but it was not necessary so far as the Board of Foreign Missions was concerned.

The Synod has also directed that the loans shall be entered on the books of the Treasurer, which shall be examined by the Auditing Committee. That also has always been the rule of the Board of Foreign Missions.

The Board has also a regulation in regard to legacies that they shall be receipted for by the Treasurer by the consent of the Finance Committee. In regard to this and other matters, safeguards which experience had taught the Board to establish by separate resolutions, adopted at various times, were embodied by a competent attorney in one series of regulations and entered on the records some years ago.

It has been very painful to find from the correspondence of the Board that in some of the churches Mr. Gamaliel G. Smith, the late Treasurer of the Board of Foreign Missions, is confounded with John R. Smith, the defaulting Treasurer of the Board of Domestic Missions. They were two distinct persons. Mr. Gamaliel G. Smith, a faithful and earnest Christian, and a gentleman of sterling integrity, perfectly candid in all his transactions as Treasurer of the Board of Foreign Missions, died a most Christian death on April 30th, the last day of the fiscal year, in a good old age, for he had passed beyond three score and ten years, and the sense of bereavement abides with us.

Yet another point asks for attention. Money is still remitted by postal money orders payable to Mr. Gamaliel G. Smith. The regulations of the Department require that they be transmitted to Mr. Smith's executors, to be signed by them. As they are not in this city, time is consumed in obtaining payment. Will those who remit kindly make such orders payable to John M. Ferris, who is Treasurer for the present? Those who have been remitting to Rev. Dr. Cobb, the Secretary, need make no change.—OFFICIAL]

....EAST GREENBUSH, N Y.—The ladies of the Reformed Church held a Japanese and fancy bazaar in the lecture-room of the church on Thursday and Friday evenings, June 17th and 18th. The room was made very attractive by extensive floral and Japanese decorations. A large number were present both evenings, and the proceeds, which amounted to about $200, are to be appropriated for a piano for the church. Those presiding at the Japanese booth wore Japanese costumes which were very unique and greatly admired. The display of art specimens, bric à-brac, fancy and domestic articles, was large and varied. A "Well in the Forest" containing "not water, but iced lemonade," and presided over by "four pretty maids and their gallant attendants who acted as aids," was well patronized. On Friday evening an entertainment was given, consisting of recitations, fine singing by a male quartette of the place, and the reading of an original poem descriptive of the fair. A.

....MOUNT VERNON, N. Y.—The Rev. C. K. Clearwater, pastor, welcomed twelve to the communion on confession on June 13th. The annual report of this church just rendered shows a steady and pleasing growth. As the beautiful suburban village grows rapidly towards the proportions of a city, it is gratifying to know that this only representative of the Presbyterian order within its limits keeps pace with the increase.

...FRANKLIN, N. J.—Sunday, June 13th, was our communion. The Lord tenderly drew five into His fold, and led them to make public confession of their faith. We were also privileged to welcome two by letter.

....NEW YORK CITY (High Bridge).—Rev. Daniel H. Martin, pastor of the Union Reformed Church, has declined the call extended to him by the First Reformed Church of Schenectady. The strong appeal made by his own people to him to remain with them and the urgent needs of his field of labor here, made it impossible for him to accept the very flattering invitation of the Schenectady Church.

....NYACK, N. Y.—The fiftieth anniversary of the dedication of the Reformed Church was celebrated on Thursday, June 17th, with appropriate services. The last pastor, Rev. Dr. W. H. Clark, presided, and the Rev. Dr. C. S. Hageman, who was the second pastor, delivered the historical discourse. Several resident and neighboring ministers took part in the exercises. Large and delighted audiences attended both in the afternoon and evening. A more particular account will be given next week.

....PERSONALS.—The Rev. D. H. Martin, of High Bridge, N. Y., has received a unanimous call from the First Church of Schenectady, N. Y....The Rev. Mr. Brandow, of Coxsackie, N. Y., recently licensed to preach, has accepted a call to Mohawk, N. Y....The Rev. Bernardus De Bey, of Chicago, Ill., celebrated on Monday, June 21st, the fortieth anniversary of his induction into the ministry.

The North Church of Brooklyn.

THE appeal of the North Church to churches of the denomination for aid, did not secure, by June 1st, the full amount needed to accomplish the object desired; but a loan of $400 from the Church Building Fund, and another of $300 from individuals, for which the pastor became personally responsible, has enabled the church to comply with the prescribed conditions, and on Friday, June 18th, the second mortgage of $6,000 was satisfied.

We now owe but $14,000, of which $4,000 is provided for by pledges received. It is hoped that the $700 mentioned above will be contributed by churches that have been appealed to, but have not yet responded. If this is not done, the pastor must pay the amount from his next year's salary, his salary for this year having already been contributed.

The assistance promised by other churches may be sent to us either directly, or in care of Dr. West, and the amount given by each church will be credited to that church on account of Church Building Fund.

As soon as all collections are received a mortgage for the amount will be given to the Board of Domestic Missions.

We are not masters of any language that can adequately express our thanks to our friends for their prompt reply to our appeal and for their cheering words of encouragement and approval. As a church we hope to show our gratitude by our works.

For the Consistory, WILLIAM D. PERRY, President.
95 ADELPHI ST., Brooklyn, N. Y.

....PASTORS' ASSOCIATION.—At the meeting, June 21st, the Rev. H. C. Berg discussed the question, "Is Ordination Necessary to the Constitution of a Minister?" of which he took the affirmative side. The discussion which followed was animated and favored the same view. The Rev. Dr. Van Horn, of the Reformed Church in the United States, and the Rev. Mr. Marvin, Congregationalist, were present and spoke. The Association adjourned for the summer to meet September 13th, when the subject will be "Vacation Experiences."

....THE BACCALAUREATE SERMON delivered on Sabbath evening by Rev. Wesley R. Davis, D.D., of Albany, before the graduating class of Rutgers, was distinguished by eloquence and power.

...HACKENSACK, N. J.—The new pastor of the First Church, Rev. H. Vanderwart, had the satisfaction of receiving into the communion, June 6th, nine members—four on confession.

....BROOKLYN, E. D., N. Y.—On Tuesday evening, the 15th, the Kent Street Church held a jubilee service expressive of the joy felt in being released from the last item of debt. The obligation, amounting to $6,000, was on the chapel. Encouraged by a bequest of $3,000, the congregation had made up an equal sum and the indebtedness was paid. The Rev. Lewis Francis made an address to the large audience, recounting the liberality of the congregation, especially since 1869, which is instructive, but is of necessity reserved for publication hereafter. Rev. Dr. Ingersoll, of the Church of the Puritans, presented to the pastor an artist's proof of a handsome etching, richly framed, as an expression of the esteem and love of the people. Congratulatory addresses were made by the pastors of six churches of the vicinity, representing five denominations.

...MONTROSE, N. Y.—The Rev. J. A. Harper, pastor of the church, preached the last Sabbath in May his twelfth anniversary sermon, in which he gave a full and gratifying report of the results of his labors. To a membership of forty-one when he took charge there had been added ninety-five; he had officiated at 177 funerals and 72 weddings. The Sabbath-school of 135 members had lately been supplied with a library of 400 volumes. They have in successful operation a Woman's Missionary Society and a Ladies' Aid Society.

What gave additional interest to the service was the fact that it was the first Sabbath the congregation had occupied the church since it was closed for repairs. The newly tinted, and otherwise improved ceiling and walls, the new floor and pews, the aisles carpeted with rich Brussels, and other changes produce a pleasing effect and give to the interior of the building an entirely new appearance. The total cost of the improvements is $1,236 90. The communion table, pulpit, pulpit and choir chairs, chandelier, collection plates, flower stand, and other pieces of furniture, were donated by individual friends of the church.

....REV. J. ELMENDORF, D.D.—The congregation of the Second Church of Poughkeepsie, after expressing the "sincere sorrow" with which they assent to the transfer of Dr. Elmendorf to the Church of Harlem, add the following:

"That we recognize with devout gratitude to God, the fidelity and ability of his ministry among us, and the peace and prosperity which we as a church have consequently enjoyed.

"That in the departure of Dr. Elmendorf from this city, the city as well as this church suffers a grievous loss, inasmuch as it is deprived of the presence and counsel and labor of one who has been eminently characterized by a generous public spirit, and by earnest and manifold efforts to promote the highest welfare of the whole community.

"That we place on record our appreciation of our pastor, not only as a man of rich mental endowment, and ripe scholarship which have rendered his ministration in the pulpit in the highest degree instructive, and of delicate and tender sympathy which has rendered his ministrations to the sick and sorrowful most helpful and precious; and of refined courtesy which has made all his social intercourse with his people to be to them a source of uninterrupted pleasure; and of admirable judgment which has enabled him to guide the affairs of the church with discretion; but also and above all as a man of God, blessed abundantly with an unction from on high, anointed by the Spirit of Christ, and laboring earnestly and affectionately for the upbuilding of the kingdom of Christ by bringing men into saving fellowship with Him.

"That we commend him to the love and confidence of the church of which he is about to become the pastor, and that we pray and will continue to pray that the blessing of God may abide with him and his family, and that his labors in the Gospel may be crowned with abundant success."

CHAPTER II.

IT sometimes happens that we see those whom we have considered the weakest and most inefficient among us, develop unexpected strength under circumstances so trying that even we, with our stronger nature, would have faltered and failed. It was thus with Ruth Loring. The thought of her children's helplessness had imbued her gentle, dependent disposition with a healthful, honest pride and a sturdy determination to fight the battle of life bravely and successfully. But she found it bitter hard. Every avenue seemed crowded. There was a demand for well-trained workers, but little call for the apprentice and the novice. Day after day she pored over the columns of advertisements. She answered many a "Wanted," always finding that she lacked just this or that requisite with which to fill the position satisfactorily. Many were the slights and rebuffs that she received; sneers and insults, too, were her portion, and her soul swelled with bitterness. It was such a contrast to the tender care of the husband who had never suffered the winds of heaven to blow too rudely on her.

She tried painting and embroidery, made some dainty bits, creditable to an amateur; but she found that she had to compete with professional artists who were skilled in catering to the public taste. She took in plain sewing, but her fingers were clumsy and slow and the pay was a bare pittance. Of course, her two children were encumbrances. Had she been alone, she might have more easily found a position.

One evening, after a day of fruitless search for employment, she was wearily pushing her way through the crowded streets toward the humble little home which was all that was now left to her. The prospect was anything but encouraging. Even nature's mood seemed to sympathize with hers. It was the close of a dull November day. The streets were full of mud, which the fast-increasing cold was beginning to freeze into rough ridges. The chill winds swept around the corners, bearing on their wings a few snow-flakes whose sharp crystals stung her face and whitened her hair. The sky was a heavy leaden gray, threatening a coming storm. People were hurrying along—some of them, God be thanked, to happy homes. But in the busy throng Ruth was pushed and jostled, and with her two little ones clinging on either side, could make but slow progress.

"Mamma! I is so cold!" said little Beth, lagging behind, "so cold and dweadful tired!"

Ruth drew aside into a little courtway, out of the mad rush of the crowd, and, as she stooped to comfort her half-sobbing girlie, there fell upon her ear the sound of singing. It proceeded from a little wooden chapel near by, over the door of which was a placard bearing the invitation:

"Prayer-meeting this evening. Strangers cordially invited."

Some sudden impulse, or shall we call it touch of that Divine hand that guards our lives? came into Ruth's mind. Why not step in for a few minutes? The children were cold and tired. Here she would find at least warmth and rest. The next minute found her in the long, plain room already nearly filled with a motley crowd. The service had begun, and, somewhat embarrassed by her novel position, Ruth hardly knew where to find a seat, but suddenly she felt a friendly touch on her shoulder, and almost before she knew it she found herself seated in a quiet corner, while her two little ones were comfortably snuggled up in the arms of the dearest and quaintest old woman she had ever seen. A very plainly clad person, however, wearing an old-fashioned black gown and shawl. About her neck was a spotlessly white kerchief. On her head was a neat crape bonnet, beneath which strayed out a few soft, white curls that seemed like a halo around a plump, rosy face whose every expression was kindness and good nature.

Ruth had fallen into good hands, for old Mother Bartlett, as she was called, was one whose life was like sunshine—warm, benignant and healthful. No wonder that little Beth and Ray made no resistance when she drew them up beside her, for her smile had in it a magnetism which even Ruth herself felt.

Presently, the two women fell talking. About the children at first, I believe, and so the acquaintance was begun. As for the meeting itself, Ruth thoroughly enjoyed it. The leader evidently understood how to feed the hungry souls waiting before him. They were working people, and so he told them of the carpenter's son and the fishermen beside the sea. It was to the poor and lowly, yes, and to the sinning! that God had given His great gift. Would they not accept? Preaching, prayers and hymns were simple, sincere and helpful. There was a heartiness about it all, a feeling of universal brotherhood that was most cheering and uplifting to the tired workers, and when the service was over Ruth confessed to herself that she had received much more than she had come for—not only bodily comfort and rest, but also spiritual warmth and rest.

Good Mother Bartlett was not one to lose track of this chance acquaintance. She trotted along, close beside Ruth, still holding the plump, dimpled hand of one of the children.

"You're a stranger here, ain't you?" inquired the old woman, her tone full of the kindly interest which is never inquisitiveness. "Do you live in this part of town?"

"On Maple street," was Ruth's reply.

"Maple street! Why then you are one of my neighbors! I live at Mr. Green's. Right on the corner—the florist's, you know. You must have seen the place."

Yes, Ruth had. She had often lingered beside the tall iron fence, gazing with hungry longing at the mass of fresh greenery and vivid blossoms pressed against the crystal panes of the hot houses. It was the one bright spot in all the long, dingy, dreary street.

"Yes," continued Mother Bartlett, "I've lived there nigh on to thirty years. As housekeeper, you know. There's only us two. I've known Mr. Green ever since he was knee high to a grasshopper! Used to live next door neighbor to his mother. I get lonesome sometimes without any children around. The flowers are company, though, to be sure, I don't do much fussing around amongst them, for I am so fat and clumsy that I'm forever knocking over the pots! You like flowers, did you say? Come over and see them—and me, too. Perhaps we may chirk one another up a bit. You're a widow, you say, and so am I. And bring the children with you, bless their hearts! Now promise that you will come, won't you? We ought to be friends; we both belong to the Lord!"

Belong to the Lord! Ruth Loring said the words over as she entered her little home that night. They gave her a sudden thrill of peace and happiness. It was comforting to think that she and her little ones were under the care of the great and loving, though unseen, Father!

Somehow she felt strongly drawn to the little old woman. She was still young enough to hunger for the brooding care and tender motherliness of one older and wiser. So, one afternoon after finishing up her bit of housework, she took the children and walked around the corner to the florist's.

The grounds occupied by the conservatories had once belonged to a wealthy estate, and the adjoining dwelling-house, in which lived the florist, had an air of faded grandeur and ancient respectability. But extreme neatness also pervaded everything. The narrow, brick walk leading up to it was swept free from crackling, brown leaves and twigs; the green-painted trellises on either side of the porch, the slate-colored steps and even the straw mat, were al clear of dust.

Ruth's ring was answered by Mother Bartlett herself, her rosy face wearing a smile of welcome.

"Come right in, do! I'm dreadful glad to see you, and the little darlings, too! Take off your wraps. It's warm in here, but we didn't dare to let the fire go out for fear of another cold spell. It's regular Indian summer weather to-day. Such a change from last week! You won't mind if I take you with me right out into the greenhouse, will you?"

"That's just where I'd like to go," Ruth replied. "I want to see the flowers."

"Well, I don't want to see 'em one bit, but I've got to!" said the old woman with a chuckle. "They've pestered me so to-day that I'm nigh about sick! You see, Mr. Green got an order for decorations for a wedding—a grand affair up-town—and what should happen but James Bailey, the man who does all the fancy arranging, must take it into his head to go off on a spree. It isn't the first time, nor the second, either, that he's served Mr. Green so, and he says he'll discharge him. I don't blame him one bit, either, for he's dreadfully trying." Good Mother Bartlett was rather mixed as to her pronouns, but quite regardless of this, she rattled on in her breezy way, at the same time leading Ruth and the children along a narrow passage which suddenly terminated in the glare of light, the soft, moist atmosphere, the brilliant mingling of colors and delicious perfumes of the conservatory. Here on a long table lay a confused heap of wire frames, balls of fine twine and masses of foliage and freshly cut flowers.

"Now ain't I in a pickle!" exclaimed the little old woman, lifting her plump hands in mock horror. "I've been a puttering and a-fussing here for over two mortal hours! Those bridal folks want a big wedding-bell all made out of flowers. Then there is a bouquet of orange blossoms, to say nothing of table decorations. Green's been out all the forenoon trying to get somebody to help him. He's just about wild, the poor man! Said I must try and see what I could do in the way of fixing them; but land! I ain't any more taste than a cow. If it was making a batch of doughnuts or reseating a pair of trousers, I might do it, but flowers! I like to see 'em and smell 'em, but when it comes to arranging them and putting the colors so's they'll contrast prettily, why I can't! Now, Mrs. Loring, do tell me where to put this heliotrope; purple is such a queer color to place right."

Ruth was eager to give the requested assistance. This was work in which she delighted. Slipping on a long apron of Mother Bartlett's she seated herself beside the long table, and soon the flowers grew into designs of marvellous beauty beneath her fingers. She was happy and content. There was a certain indescribable charm in being surrounded by all this mass of bloom. Roses, pure white, creamy-petalled, daintiest pink and darkest red, royal lilies, spicy carnations, golden-strung, incense-breathing jasmine, flaming salvias, modest alyssum and mignonette,—all these old acquaintances and a score of new ones breathed their fragrance around her and gave her inspiration.

Good Mother Bartlett ceased working, relieved and grateful to see her distasteful task in competent hands, and so she betook herself to entertaining little Beth and Ray with mugs of milk and a plate of plump seed cookies.

When Mr. Green returned late that afternoon, tired and discouraged after his fruitless search, and full of dismay at the arduous task awaiting him, he found the long table covered, not with a mass of disordered leaves and flowers, but he beheld instead, upon a bed of damp moss a beautiful and symmetrically-shaped bell of white with pink rim and golden tongue—all of fragrant flowers. And near it lay other decorations displaying wondrous taste and beauty. Over Mr. Green's rugged Scotch features stole an expression of relief and wonder.

"Mother Bartlett!" he exclaimed, "What magic wand have you been using."

"'Tain't me!" chirped the old lady. "This is the fairy who did it," drawing out Ruth, who had modestly stepped into the little passage-way. "And hasn't she done them beautifully. She's Mrs. Loring, the lady I met at the prayer-meeting the other night. She's looking for work so's she can support herself and two children and she says that if you haven't engaged anyone in James Bailey's place, perhaps she might fill the position."

"If she does her work like this I reckon she can have it," was the Scotchman's reply, given in a tone of gruff good humor.

Our Fourth of July Lesson.

BY REV. WILBUR F. CRAFTS.

A LESSON showing how Christ kept the Sabbath is very timely for the Fourth of July, as presenting a topic in regard to which patriotism and religion are alike concerned.

Whenever any effort is made to protect the Sabbath against the encroachments of its two chief foes, Greed and Appetite, the cry is raised that we are seeking to restore the Puritan Sabbath or the Jewish Sabbath. Nay, we seek to restore the Christian Sabbath, the Sabbath as it was observed by the Man of men. To restore the Jewish Sabbath would mean to make it a capital crime to kindle a fire on that day. I know of no one who advocates that. To restore the Pharisaic Sabbath (which is what many have in mind when they talk of the "Jewish Sabbath"), would mean to make it an offence to bear "the burden" of false teeth or false hair on the Sabbath. I know of no one who is making a crusade for bald heads and bald gums. To restore the Puritan Sabbath would be to put the furnaces out of our churches. I know of no one who does not think most of them cold enough already.

It is the Sabbath which was "made for man" as the crowning act of creation, and incorporated into the universal and eternal law code of Sinai, and put into perfect practice by Jesus Christ, that Christian statesmen wish to see restored, not less for the good of men than for the glory of God.

Christ, as Lord of the Sabbath, showed by precept and example, first, that works of necessity had always been allowable on the Sabbath. He even sanctioned the preparation of a "Sunday dinner,"—of cracked wheat, (Matt. 12: 1–8),—which kept no one at home from church to cook it. Fie upon the religion of any man who will make a soul fast that his body may feast. That incident of the wheat was Christ's commentary on the old Jewish law against fires on the Sabbath. It was given in the Arabian desert where the only use of fires was to cook, and so in its kernel it was a law against cooking in the hours of worship. There can be no objection to having the best dinner of the week on its best day, if no grocer or confectioner or cook is thereby robbed of the God-given right to Sabbath rest and worship.

Another example of "works of necessity" cited by Christ (with approval) from Jewish law, was watering cattle. Strange that some of the Bible-loving Highlanders of Scotland to this day make their very families drink the water brought on Saturday all through the Sabbath. "How much more is a man better than a sheep?"

That Christ sanctioned eating and drinking on the Sabbath as works of necessity carries no sanction of the inhumanity and shiftlessness of Sunday trading, of which nothing but a very limited traffic in milk and medicines can be counted as "necessary." That God's laws are "not grievious" but humane, is being proved by the recent movements of grocers, barbers and other Sunday workers, asking for the enforcement of the Sunday laws, not for religious reasons, but for their own protection against thoughtless rivals and customers.

Christ showed by precept and example, second, that works of religion had always been not only allowed but enjoined, such as circumcision (John 7: 23), the priests' duties in public worship (Matt. 12: 5, 6), and even visiting—for religious conversation. It is Christlike to go out to dine on the Sabbath if our object is not gossip but gospel. Sometimes a teacher may with profit make a Sunday visit on a scholar, or vice versa, but as the Sabbath is preëminently the "home day," the only day when the family can be together, any Sunday visit that is not a family reunion or for religious purposes, is an impudent intrusion, against which Christian homes need to devise ingenious and courageous defences. Manufacturers testify that those who spend the Sabbath in so-called "recreation" are much less rested on Monday morning than those who spent the Sabbath resting by change of work in the church and Sabbath-school.

In what Christ said about the Sabbath, and more especially by what He did on that day, He showed that works of mercy had always been not only permissible but obligatory. He wrought eight miracles of healing on Sabbath days in the four quarters of Palestine—miracles that in every case might have waited a day if He had not preferred the Sabbath. Evidently these miracles were wrought not so much to cure infirmities of the flesh as to heal the Sabbath of its Pharisaic palsy. The Pharisees forbade even healing on the Sabbath day. If the doctors had been robbed of their day of rest then, as they are now, by the coming of those seeking life-assurance examinations, and others needing patches for chronic difficulties that might have been attended to on a week day, it would have been a "work of mercy" to have made a law against crowding the doctoring of the body which could have been done on other days into the one day that belonged to the soul. But the Pharisees made no allowance even for works of mercy on the Sabbath. Christ sought opportunities to "break" that kind of a Sabbath to pieces. On various Sabbaths He performed the following miracles: A withered hand healed (Matt. 12: 9–13); healing of a demoniac and of Peter's mother-in-law (Mark 21: 1–3); healing of the woman with an infirmity (Luke 13: 10–17); dropsy cured (Luke 14: 1–6); the impotent man healed at Bethesda (John 5: 1–17); the blind man healed (John 9: 1–17).

The five great principles Christ laid down in defending these miracles were: "I will have mercy and not sacrifice;" "The Son of Man is Lord even of the Sabbath day;" "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath;" "It is lawful to do good on the Sabbath day;" "My Father worketh hitherto and I work."

This last is the deepest of all the sounding lines of the Sabbath questions, opening up its positive side, leading us from Sabbath don'ts to Sabbath deeds. God "rested" on the Sabbath day, not from work, but by change from work among minerals, vegetables, animals, to work for the soul, which neither in God or man is called to cease by the Sabbath. Work for gain is to halt; but work for God is to be continued and intensified.

Another aspect of Christ's relation to the Sabbath that challenges our imitation is His courage. He was not moved from His post of antagonism to the over-strict views of the Sabbath which then prevailed by being called a "Sabbath breaker," nor should we who have "learned boldness of Him" be driven from our opposition to the lax views and practices in regard to the Sabbath that now prevail, by cheap sneers at our Puritanism. As Christ scraped off the Sabbath the barnacles of Phariseeism, let us scrape off the new barnacles of unrestful Sunday work and Sunday pleasures, but most of all, by work for God in the Sabbath-school and elsewhere let us find the subtlest Sabbath rest from week-day work for gain.

NEW YORK CITY.

Pro and Con.

THE selection of Dr. Potter's remark for publication has called out three communications.

An earnest member of a church on the upper Hudson writes:

CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER: Dr. D. C. Potter, of New York, in asserting that the Young Men's Christian Association "was taking the best of the young men out of the churches," is but echoing the opinion of one of the soundest and most godly clergymen of this city twenty-five years ago, who was opposed to organizing a society for religious work outside of the Church, and so directing the activity of members from the field instituted by our Saviour for His service, and where His blessing is promised. It would be a proper inquiry, whether the devotion to the meetings of the Y. M. C. A. is not one of the causes why our prayer-meetings and other devotional gatherings are so small in numbers.

"God in His earthly temple lays Foundation for His heavenly praise."

OLD CHURCH.

Our bishop in Indiana comes to the defence of the associations, by this paragraph:

DEAR EDITOR: Will you have a larger piece of experience on this matter? So far as my observation and experience have gone, through more than twenty years of a large and intimate acquaintance with the workings of Young Men's Christian Associations in the West, they have always tended to the helping and strengthening of the churches, in their attendance, and labors, and prayer-meetings. If the facts differ from this in the East or elsewhere, it is a cause for regret; especially since I know that the intention of the Association managers and workers, and the trend of their work for many years, has been in the direction of making their plans and labors subsidiary to the strengthening and enlargement of the Church of God. And I have personal knowledge that they have succeeded in doing this in multitudes of cases.

N. D. WILLIAMSON.

SOUTH BEND, Ind., June 11th, 1886.

A venerable and successful pastor of a Reformed church in Pennsylvania does not agree with our Western contributor. He writes:

EDITORS CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER: Allow me to express my hearty appreciation of your item in this week's issue in reference to the Y. M. C. A. I have long since been fully persuaded that this extra ecclesiastical organization has in its very constitution a tendency to undermine the Church and the ministry. It is undertaking to do a work which belongs to the Church, and which the Church can do much better than any outside voluntary association. The nearer all religious movements can be kept to the warm and beating heart of the Church, the better. The Church, as a Divine institution, embraces the most potent moral and religious forces, and does not need to have its work supplemented by anything that is weaker than itself.

It may be true that a large number of the best young men are connected with the Y. M. C. Associations, but just in this lies its greatest danger.

I may add that I have had under my care and direction, for many years, a Young Men's Prayer-Meeting which has been largely useful, and which I regard as incomparably better than any outside organization to promote in a solid and churchly form the work of God.

Some More Thoughts about Prohibition.

AT a late date the writer's attention has been called to T. W. C.'s "Thoughts about Prohibition" in the INTELLIGENCER for the 2d of June. It may not be amiss to add a few thoughts to the first three propositions.

1st. "Prohibition does not prohibit." That proposition is true. Few, probably, have denied it since it was first proven in the Garden of Eden. Yet our law-makers obstinately refuse to repeal a vast number of laws that fail to prohibit cheating, stealing, fraud, robbery and murder. The government even goes so far as to insist on trying, fining, imprisoning, and hanging, those who will not heed such prohibitions. Our parents and teachers had a number of prohibitory rules that did not prevent our waywardness; and yet those guardians of our youthful steps would not remove those regulations. Worse than that, as we have grown to take the places of teachers and parents, we actually reënact such or similar rules. Probably T. W. C., together with many other ministers, nearly every Sabbath reads a code of ten prohibitory laws that for more than three thousand years have failed to prohibit idolatry, blasphemy, Sabbath-breaking, theft, murder, and other evils. The perversity of human nature must be held responsible for this strange ignoring of, nay, rebelling against, a universal and eternal truth.

2d. "No political party founded on a single principle has ever permanently succeeded in this country." That probably accounts for the fact that the Federalist, the old Republican, and the Whig parties died so long ago. Perhaps it suggests the reason why the present political parties, so soon after the close of a contest, desert the "lightning rod" of the one great issue that each erects at the beginning of every campaign. It is to be noted, however, that the one principle, instead of laying low in death electrifies into new life any other party. It was so with the Anti-Slavery party; it was so with the Reformation party led by M. Luther; it was so with the Early Christian party of more than eighteen centuries ago. It is usually so with every party the world over, in all time, the American political party excepted.

3d. "A political party based on a moral issue is sure to be degraded." It is, however, not safe to assert that removing moral issues elevates a party. But it is safe to add that a political party will not be degraded by keeping moral issues from it; the party is already there. That which is at the bottom cannot sink. This proposition shows that there is not a friendly feeling between political parties and moral issues; but, if, when the two meet, morals bring politics down, it must not be forgotten that somebody helped politics up first. It would seem that morals, and of course moral men and principles, have a kind of malarial effect on politics. Since only political parties based on moral issues attract bad men—this does not follow from the proposition, but from what followed the proposition—then, it becomes clear that moral issues are not safe anywhere. That may be the reason why the friends of the concert saloons, the drinking saloons, and many other places of like character refuse to have anything to do with moral issues, or indeed with moral questions of any kind. Possibly Satan himself shrewdly refuses to raise any moral issue lest he attract to himself a crowd of scallawags.

....More is given to destroy than to save. During the last thirty years war has caused in Christian nations a loss of 2,000,000 men and $15,000,000,000. The yearly expenditure of Christian nations on standing armies is $2,500,000,000, and for missions, $10,000,000; and yet some think too much is given to send the Gospel to the heathen!—Journal and Messenger.

....On the eve of a visit to Europe the late John Welsh looked casually over the books of the Episcopal Hospital at Philadelphia, and noticed that the debts amounted to $18 000. Two days later, when he was on the ocean and beyond the reach of thanks, the managers received his check for the full amount.

....An entire congregation of Moravians, expelled from Russia for no other reason but their wish to form an evangelical community, arrived in Berlin in a destitute condition. The government had not even allowed them to sell their property, and they had to leave as beggars. The Moravians of Berlin received them most kindly, collected the sum of $5,000 among themselves, and helped them in every way to continue their journey by Hamburg to Southern Brazil. —The Lutheran.

Our Book-Shelves.

....“ENGLISH HYMNS: Their Authors and History.” By Samuel W. Duffield. Every lover of English Hymnology who consults this book will feel grateful to its author. It is a guide to the understanding, a stimulus to feeling, and a mine of illustration. We have some fifteen hundred hymns, including all the well known lyrics of our denominational books and many known to select circles of readers, well arranged, and fully treated as to their origin and general influence. A complete index follows, so that one can find the allusions to the authors or the hymns which are scattered through the volume. The work done seems to us enormous, and only possible to one fully equipped for this special service. We commend the book especially to pastors as indeed a “compendium of biography, incident and religious suggestion,” which they will find rarely equalled. The publishers have done their work well, so that the volume will be prized for its look as well as contents. There is a most rightful dedication to Dr. Charles W. Robinson, and an excellent preface, in which the author, with pardonable pride, tells of the labor expended in the preparation of the volume. (Funk & Wagnalls)

....“THE SIMPLICITY THAT IS IN CHRIST.” Sermons to the Woodland Church, Philadelphia. By Leonard Woolsey Bacon. This volume consists of sermons which, like those of Dr. Talmage, though for a different reason, are quite out of the usual course. They are fresh, vigorous and readable. They contain much that is true and edifying. But the author is anxious to emphasize his dissent from the views and statements commonly considered orthodox, and never seems happier than when he is giving a dig into the Westminster standards or their accredited expounders. The title of his book is meant to imply that religious teachers generally corrupt the truth by tradition or metaphysics, whereas Mr. Bacon adheres to the simplicity that is in Christ. But his very first sermon shows what sad work he makes of this revolt from all authorities. He insists that the Scripture word for Repentance means Changing your mind. But any tyro knows that this is not true. A man who turns from one political party to another changes his mind, but are we to be told that this is the Gospel grace of repentance? That grace does indeed mean a change of mind, but according to Scripture it includes a good deal more, sorrow for sin, the forsaking of sin and an apprehension of God's mercy in Christ. Mr. Bacon would doubtless say he admits all this. But if so, why quarrel with the word whose meaning has been defined and settled for centuries? And how ridiculous is it to dwell on the etymological sense of a term without reference to the modifications it obtains from usage?

We have cited this case as a good specimen of much (but by no means all) of the freshness that is in the book. The title might fairly be changed from “The Simplicity that is in Christ,” to the Shallowness that is in Mr. Bacon. (Funk & Wagnalls.)

....“UNWISE LAWS” is a treatise on the practical workings of the protective policy by Lewis H. Blair, a merchant of Richmond, Va., who claims to be in a position to observe impartially both sides of the tariff question. It is not for us to pronounce upon the merits of the subject, nor the strength of Mr. Blair's argument. We can only say that he has made a very readable little book, and seems to us to have succeeded in the special aim which he announces when he says that it is “intended for plain, sensible people who have no time nor taste for elaborate disquisitions on the tariff, but who nevertheless would be glad to know something about the subject, provided it is presented in a manner congenial to their methods of thought.” (G. P. Putnam's Sons.)

....“PRECIOUS HYMNS FOR TIMES OF REFRESHING AND REVIVAL.” During such seasons as are described in this title the critical spirit is silent and a holier mood prevails, but just as we would not publish the prayers and addresses of such seasons in a manual of devotion, so it seems to have been unwise to put into permanent shape the hymns of this collection, on the ground of their having been effective in revival services. There are very few of the pieces thus published that can have more than an ephemeral interest, as both poetry and melody are decidedly below the average of such compositions. Musical editors, John R. Sweeney and W. J. Kirkpatrick. (John J. Hood, Philadelphia.)

....“THE TALL CHESTNUTS OF VANDYKE,” is the odd title of a religious story told by the anonymous author of several previous books for young people. Its object is to illustrate the workings of Christian charity, and the imprint of the publishers is a fair guarantee of its excellence. It tells the good done by the boys and girls of the country schoolhouse of Vandyke, who chose their names from the chestnut trees that grew around it. (American Tract Society.)

....The very convenient and portable volume of “POCKET LESSON NOTES,” prepared by the Rev. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts, for the quarter beginning on July 1st, has been published. For the sake of those who have failed to notice this provision for the wants of teachers and scholars we say that it is a rectangular pamphlet with flexible and durable paper covers, and can be carried with comfort in a side pocket; has the text of the Common and Revised Versions; the comments of Jamieson, Fausset and Brown; marginal references; home readings, and notes explanatory and practical by the editors, whose qualifications are well known. (Funk & Wagnalls.)

....“THE WIND OF DESTINY.” By Arthur S Hardy. Prof. Hardy's “But Yet a Woman” won a deserved reputation. “The Wind of Destiny” will certainly not tend to decrease the author's fame, though it does not seem to us to display any marked advance above the earlier work. We cannot go into the plot of the story, for there are too many details from the sudden love-dream of the serious Schonberg to his quiet death in later years. The great point of the author is in style rather than narrative. The incidents are often elaborated and then suddenly drop into mere statement, while epigrammatic observations are scattered profusely through the pages. The effect is like a wind rising into long gusts and then subsiding into brief seasons of calm, making the title singularly appropriate. It recalls the style somewhat of Kimball's “Saint Leger,” though differing in many particulars. The book is worthy a careful reading by lovers of the best fiction. (Houghton, Mifflin & Co)

....“EUGENIE GRANDET.” By Honoré De Balzac. The greatest French novelist of this century at last is securing an English dress, which we trust may cover some of his French coarseness. In Eugénie Grandet we have avarice presented in a most powerful way, its very successes made abhorrent and its end more terrible from the applause with which the world regards great wealth. The tragedy of love lingering in the miser's home and cruelly disappointed at the end, is more saddening even than the description of the money-getter. Balzac paints life with graphic power, but we confess that we are always depressed by his stories. Like George Eliot, the Frenchman never seemed to realize how many lives on earth are made happy through all kinds of trial by a constant spiritual intercourse with God the Saviour.

The publishers are to be congratulated on the tasteful binding and excellent press work of this edition. There is a really Parisian “tone” given to the volumes as they stand in the library. (Roberts Bros.)

....“FACE TO FACE,” an anonymous novel, is a very readable book, clear in style, with a pleasant vein of humor, and unflagging in the interest of the narrative. The earlier part is a charming little “comedy of errors,” and the latter part is exciting and somewhat melodramatic. As a whole, it is entertaining, though rather improbable. The characters of the heroine and of the anarchist, De Vito, are strongly drawn. Its merit as a work of art seems to us marred by a lack of unity, resulting from there being an insufficient connection between the two ideas on which the story turns,—viz , the misapprehensions of the English respecting our country, and the labor agitations of the day. (Charles Scribner's Sons.)

....“JOHN BODEWIN'S TESTIMONY,” by Mary Hallock Foote, is not likely to add to the author's reputation achieved by “The Led-horse Claim,” but is distinguished by the same qualities of vivid and vigorous presentation of life in the mining regions, dramatic intensity of narrative, and a successful mingling of realism and romance. The inferiority, if there be one, is in the less simple and natural character of the story itself. (Tichnor & Co.)

....“SCRUPLES.” By Mrs. J. H. Walworth. This is one of the “Rainbow Series” of original novels, and gives an excellent idea of life in Louisiana during and after the war. Some of the incidents are sensational, and the interest is well sustained from first to last. (Cassell & Co.)

Our Library Table.

Periodicals, Serials and Notes.

..The portraits in the Book Buyer are so good that they are sought after. They already form a very respectable gallery of literary celebrities. The June number has an excellent picture of the Rev. Dr. McCosh, of Princeton. The number supplies also specimens of the engravings in the Cyclopædia of Painters and Painting, of which Messrs. Scribner have published the first volume, the edition being limited to 500 copies, and the cost being $25 for each of the four volumes. Many readers, therefore, will be pleased to see these selections from the contents. The usual valuable illustrated review of recent publications occupies the remaining pages.

....The Musical Herald is a carefully edited journal, giving from month to month a large amount of information pertaining to the art to which it is devoted. The June number contains an amusing but sensible article on Voice Culture, an interesting account of the Master Singers of Germany, a plea for the Practical Value of Music and a quantity of other good reading. It has also a quartette for female voices—Heavenly Father, Grant Thy Blessing, and a transcription by Heller of Schubert's, “Thou Art the Rest.”

....The Popular Science Monthly for June repays a careful reading from end to end. In Evolution Bounded by Theology, Mr. W. B. Le Sueur traverses an article by Dr. Lyman Abbott. As we have not seen Dr. Abbott's paper, the Andover Review having boycotted THE CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER, because it declared honestly just what it thought of its articles, we venture upon no judgment on the contention. But when Mr. Le Sueur intimates that there are no ascertained, established truths, we decidedly dissent. Hon. David A. Wells contributes the third section of his very important Economic Study of Mexico. M. J. Delboeuf wrote for the Revue Scientifique one of the best papers we have seen in recent years on the intelligence of animals, and that appears here in a translation. The biography of Rafinesque, by Prof. D. S. Jordan, will introduce to many readers a strong individuality unknown to them before. The editor writes what is worth reading on the labor question. Mr Herbert Spencer's last paper on The Factors of Organic Evolution also has a place in this number. There are eighteen articles, or departments filled with brief articles.

...The Musical Visitor for June contains several well chosen anthems and organ voluntaries. It has also a considerable amount of reading matter which is of interest to the lovers of music. The Visitor deserves a welcome in many homes.

....The Expositor for June continues Maclaren's fine exposition of Colossians and Marcus Dods's fresh views of Zechariah's visions. Prof. Salmond furnishes an interesting memoir of Franz Delitzsch (with an etched portrait), and Dr. D. C. Taylor argues convincingly the priority of the Didaché to the Epistle of Barnabas.

... The Sidereal Messenger for the month contains a paper from Mr. W. F. Denning, of Bristol, England, on The Stationary Meteor Showers, which may lead to important results. A first paper by Mr. H. C. Wilson, of the Cincinnati Observatory, On Personal Errors in Double-Star Observations, ought to have the attention of observers. In the Notes will be found useful tables in relation to the companion of Sirius by Mr. McNeill, of Princeton, and a paper by Mr. Hough, of Chicago, in which he furnishes proof that Mr Denning's announcement that the red spot on Jupiter is connected with a belt on the south side, is incorrect Mr. Hough, in our judgment, is right. The fact ought to be settled, for good authorities in England are inferring from Mr. Denning's report that the red spot is higher in the atmosphere of Jupiter than the belts and some other markings. Much information relative to the new comets will be found also in the Messenger.

A Chronological Record.

MR. EDITOR: Let me call the attention of your readers to a little work which Rev. D. Van Pelt, of East New York, has compiled, and the firm of Hosford & Sons has published. It is a chronological record of the Reformed Church in America. The period covered begins with the nailing of Luther's theses to the church door and closes with the centennial of the Theological Seminary in New Brunswick. The dates are placed in clear figures on a broad margin and opposite is the corresponding historical statement. It is exceedingly convenient. Every minister of the Church will need a copy for handy consultation, while to hundreds of our people it will be valuable for its condensed and comprehensive grouping of facts which every one ought to know, but all do not; and many would not know where to look for them. The compiler has done his work carefully and gleaned closely.

I need not add that the mechanical execution is all that need be desired. The paper is tinted, the type is distinct, and the whole make up is in accord with the reputation of the house.

The price is low. I hope the little volume will find a large circulation.

The General Synod and the Newspapers.

OUR General Synod was greatly indebted to the reporters of several religious papers for excellent accounts of proceedings; but especially so to those of the Associated Press and the Fredonian and the Home News of New Brunswick. These two latter had their representatives at every session, who gave very minute and accurate reports. The enterprise and courtesy of these excellent papers all the members of the Synod will cherish in a very grateful remembrance.

Intemperance in Relation to the Labor Question.

THE organization of labor has hitherto been in the hands of unfit men, with too few exceptions. The leaders have been selfish, narrow-minded, or ignorant. The true way to utilize the strength of united labor is to develop the individual power of the members. By no other means have great nations ever been formed. An association, the effective strength of which depends upon the surrender of the rights and liberties of its members, may be a dangerous instrument for the use of adventurers and demagogues, but it cannot advance the interests of the men themselves. The most urgent want of labor to day is self-control. In this free country no man endowed with average abilities need remain all his life poor. If he has thrift, self-restraint, perseverance, he will pass from the ranks of labor to the ranks of capital. It is the saving man who becomes the capitalist,—the man who has force to deny himself indulgences. What a lesson lies in the drink-bill of the American workingmen, for instance! At a moderate estimate, it amounts to between four and five hundred million dollars a year. While labor is throwing away that enormous sum annually, with what show of consistency can it lament its condition? One year's remission of that destructive self-indulgence would solve every labor problem extant; would provide a fund for the establishment of co-operative works, for the sustenance of the sick and aged, for the maintenance and education of orphans, for libraries and scientific schools, for all manner of helps.

At present the workingman can hardly make both ends meet. Is it not because he insists on creating capitalists out of the saloon-keepers, and, not content with that, on submitting all his rights of citizenship to the same objects of worship? The saloon in politics is the most hideous abuse of the day, but where would it be if the workingmen withdrew their support from it? It keeps them poor. It keeps our politics corrupt. It supplies a constant stream of base adventurers, who disgrace the American name at home and abroad. It makes the terms "public office" and "public plunder" synonymous. It stifles progress, fosters pauperism, brutalizes husbands and fathers, breaks women's hearts, puts rags on the workingman's back, disease in his body, and shame and despair in his heart. Yet when labor is most disturbed, when the demand for advanced wages is loudest, when strikes are most frequent, when hunger and misery are most rife in the homes of the poor, the saloon flourishes still. There may be no bread at home, but there is always beer and whiskey at the bar, and the men who consider themselves the victims of circumstances or the "thralls" of capital squander their earnings, spend their savings, in these dens. Can there be a serious labor question while this state of things continues? Can workingmen talk gravely of their wrongs while it is plain to all the world that if they only saved the capital they earn they would be comfortable?

The aspect of the case has not been sufficiently examined, and for reasons which will probably occur readily to the reader. But it is really the key to the situation. When we see on the one side a yearly waste of between four and five hundred millions of dollars, and on the other side a body of men, the squanderers of this vast fund, complaining that they have not sufficient opportunities, we cannot long be at a loss to comprehend the true nature of the existing dissatisfaction. It is clear that labor has been incited to seek from without the relief which ought to be sought from within. The socialist theory of a paternal state system which provides everybody with work and wages is a mischievous fallacy. It simply encourages indolence and dependence. The first duty of labor is to demonstrate its capacity for self-government. At this moment its drink-bill is an impeachment of that capacity. No man who spends half his earnings at a saloon can get on in the world, or has the least right to expect to get on. Nor can any body of men follow the same course with better results. Prosperity is the reward of persevering, temperate, ungrudging work. In these days there is, however, a great wind of new doctrine. We are asked to believe that it is possible to succeed in very different ways: that the less a man works, for example, the more he ought to receive; that national prosperity can be advanced by diminishing production; and many other equally hard sayings. But it may be confidently affirmed that these new theories are destined to be short-lived, and that the world will have to be managed eventually upon pretty much the old lines.—George Frederic Parsons, in July Atlantic.

JUST before the outbreak of the war Stonewall Jackson, then a professor in the Virginia Military Institute at Lexington, organized a Sunday-school for colored children, which is still sustained by leading citizens there.

AUNT MARJORIE'S CORNER

Growing Old.

WE fast are growing old, my loving one and I,
But we are growing old together, together may we die.
The morn of life has passed, the noon of life is here,
If we are left together, the night we will not fear.

The days are passing on, the years fly swift away,
The silver threads are coming, the hair is getting gray;
And lines of thought are tracing their marks upon the brow
That once was smooth and polished; 'tis getting furrowed now.

The spring of life has gone; it seems but as a dream
Since we started out together to try life's changing stream.
The skies were blue and cloudless, we never thought of rain,
That to bring a future blessing oft causes bitter pain.

This life has many joys, and we have had our share,
Though trouble often came, and sorrows hard to bear.
But together we have met them, and said "It is His will,"
Clouds may obscure the sky, but the sun is shining still.

We have climbed the hill together, now we have reached the top;
May our lamp be trimmed and burning when God shall call to stop.
May the love light of our youth shine bright upon the way
As we descend the hillside to meet the close of day.

Our journey's almost over, our work is almost done;
May we never more be parted till heaven we have won.
We have loved each other dearly, and if it is God's will,
When we have crossed the river we will love each other still.

SUSAN M. DENISON.

"Sick and Ye Visited Me."

DURING hand-to-hand conflicts with disease, when death, a menacing shadow, stands grimly black threatening to envelop our home in darkness, there is room in the sick chamber for only the patient, the physician and the nurse. The presence of others, however sympathetic, is a mistake, and almost an impertinence. The sufferer and the nurse each needs to husband charily every atom of strength, the one that the rapidly dwindling reserves may yet be sufficient to withstand the shocks of pain and the wasting flames of fever, the other that every faculty may remain keen and watchful, and that she may be ready to seize upon any advantage, however slight, and utilize it for the benefit of her charge. There is no time for the exchange of light pleasantries, the small talk of society, the usual courtesies when friends meet, so long as the battle is waging and the result uncertain, and, therefore, the dearest friends show both their good will and their common sense by confining the expression of their interest to inquiries at the door. Nobody with ordinary intelligence is ever hurt or offended when excluded from the house in which some one is ill. To go daily with a question or a message is an attention which is appreciated as truest kindness, but for the sake of the loved one hovering between life and death, let those who are responsible be brave enough to risk displeasure, and guard the door of the invalid from obtrusive, though well-meaning visitors.

In the days of convalescence the situation is changed. Then, during many tedious hours, the coming in of a friend is like the entrance of the sunshine. Above all things, the visitor should go in with a bright, cheery manner, the gayer the better, and should not stay long enough to tire the invalid. Nothing is sweeter than to be remembered, and so, while the great world is occupied with business and pleasure, while others are courting, and marrying, and going to parties, and taking summer excursions, and we are lying on the sofa or sitting languidly in the easy chair—idle ships undergoing repairs in the dry dock, while here and there over the seas the white sails are flitting—it does us good to be assured that we are still valued by our kind.

Who that has seen the rose flush deepen on the pale cheek as thin hands linger with caressing touches over the roses which have been sent with a tender message, can doubt that flowers have angel's work to do in the room of illness. It costs little to send a bouquet to one who will hail each separate leaf and bud as a quotation from the great rustling, breezy book of nature; but the gift has a worth in present comfort and in pleasant memories after its bloom has faded, not to be computed in gold and silver.

Sitting the other day with a dear invalid who has been a prisoner in her room during all the spring and through the sunny days of June, she happened to say, "I have had such a treat this week. —— came the other day and played for me. The parlor door stood open, and as the sweet sounds floated up I felt half in heaven. I forgot my pain and my weakness, and just lay here listening in ecstasy." A patient old German friend, who has been a hopeless shut-in for a score of years, is sometimes cheered on Sabbath afternoons when a class of young girls goes from Sunday-school to sing for her, their fresh voices wafting her as on wings to the land where the inhabitant shall never say, "I am sick."

In many little ways, reading for a half hour to one whose eyes are not strong enough to dwell on the printed page, sitting with an invalid, that her companion, the weary mother or sister who has borne the brunt of the watching, may go out for an airing, in the making of appetizing dishes, or arranging a surprise in the form of a daintily delicate luncheon, one may enliven the room of illness. Never are such attentions more grateful than when offered to those who are in the grip of that relentless destroyer, consumption, failing so imperceptibly that love is blind to the approach of doom even while tremblingly expectant.

"Sick and ye visited me!" Yes, blessed Master! We are thankful for the sweetness of the word. It is easy to incur a slight self-denial, to leave the ways of our own swift activities and sit in patience by one on whom God's hand presses, if we are sure that the dear Lord counts it as done unto Himself.

AUNT MARJORIE.

A Vacation Echo.

"All good deeds are done to Him."

VACATION might aptly be called impression time. Scarcely any one of us in the days we shall spend away from our homes but will mingle with strangers. We shall receive impressions from them, (unrecognized at the time perhaps,) and in turn we make an impression. Each summer in most of our lives is marked by some one well-remembered circumstance, event or person. Some three or four years ago I met a bright young girl whose life, for the few weeks in which we were in daily contact, was the living epistle of one word—"Inasmuch." What a vacation motto! how forcibly she put it into practice, and among the many guests at Maple Hill that year her opportunities were not a few. They were every-day affairs. A story told a group of restless children, impatient on account of the shower that had interrupted their play, a book quietly handed the boy homesick and lonely in a strange place, listening with patient attention to the garrulous old lady who seemed never to lose an occasion to entice our companion from us. Somebody was always wanting Miss Amy, and it was a genuine pleasure to have her all to one's self now and then. But in the house or out, the life was the same. If we were riding, room could always be made for the little girl or boy whom we found trudging along with a pail of berries, or for a basket of clean clothes that was coaxed from the tired washerwoman on her way to the Hill House. Perhaps the reminiscence most impressed upon my mind in connection with our rides is this: We were driving home one very warm afternoon, and were enjoying some delicious peaches, one of our village purchases. We passed many teams, as it was the main road; one old man slowly plodding up hill beside his heavy load of sand specially attracted us. Quick as though Amy drew in our horse, and reached down, handed him a couple of peaches; if thanks were needed she had them in his look of grateful surprise. To me she said in a matter of-fact way, "They tasted so good to us;" and I drew my own conclusion.

Instances and incidents could be multiplied, for here, there, and everywhere this seemingly unconscious service "unto one of these" was performed. What though it was nothing but letting some one else take the best croquet mallet, or being willing to ride with the driver, or play tennis with "just those boys," or helping the little tots make jack o' lanterns.

"It is not the deed we do,
Though the deed be never so fair,
But the love the dear Lord looketh for,
Hidden with holy care
In the heart of the deed so fair."

And the value of Amy's deeds was priceless, because done unto Him who bade us, as well as those other disciples, remember, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

"Inasmuch. Take courage, Christian!
And our Master's words obey;
For He will fulfil each promise
In that final judgment day."

A. E. W.

THE VIRTUE OF A GIFT is in the giving, and not in the gift. The less expectation we can have of a return, the more absolute the gift. The more absolute the gift, the better it is for the giver; for the less of self there is in it. If there is a just claim upon us, it is our duty to satisfy the claim, and not ourselves. If the claim be founded on deference to sex, or to age, or to character, or to physical need, the claim must remain while its cause remains. Ingratitude, or moral obtuseness, however repulsive on the part of the recipient, does not, in itself, change the duty of the giver. The receiver is responsible for his or her moral attitude; the giver for his. The debt is to God, and to God it must be paid.—S. S. Times.

The Dead Darling.

O LITTLE babe at rest,
How truly art thou blest,
Thou lamb within the fold,
Safe sheltered from earth's cold.

O aching mother-heart,
How truly blest thou art;
Thy lamb's within the fold,
That precious promise old,

Sweet comfort brings to thee;
"Their angels always see
The Father's face on high;"
To Him they're ever nigh.

Take comfort, hope—press on,
The night wanes, and the morn
Is never far away,
How near, we cannot say.

And think, "The Father knows
His hand doth strike the blows
That fall on shrinking souls;
That never trouble rolls

Across our happy lives;
But 'tis His love that rives
Our tender hearts," and He
Will surely comfort thee.

A Genuine Surrender.

"All that the Father giveth shall come to me, and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out."—JOHN 6:37.

A SKEPTICAL soldier, in the hospital at Atlanta, sent for a chaplain, and in various ways tried to get rid of his doubts. Upon the wall was hung the Scripture: "Whoso cometh to me I will in no wise cast out," which caught his attention one night. In the morning he asked to have a letter from his mother read to him. It was an earnest entreaty to accept Christ. The reader came to the words, "Whoso cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." "There," said he, "that's what I want. I thought mother said that. Read it again." It was read. "Mother says that, does she?" "Yes." "And it is in the Bible, too?" "Yes." "Then it must be true. Jesus will receive me. I will come to Him. Here, Lord, I give myself up." It appeared to be a genuine surrender, and a gracious acceptance.

While there is eternal life in the Gospel sufficient for all, none are specially excluded from its benefits. Those only are excluded who exclude themselves and refuse to be saved on God's own terms. His proclamation to a lost, rebel world, is clogged with no exceptions. Dr. Guthrie relates the following: "After our brave men had crushed that terrible revolt which some years ago shook our Indian empire to its foundations, and filled many of our homes with grief, an amnesty was proclaimed, but not to all. Some were by name excluded from its grace, and, as might have been expected, these desperate men fought it out to the last in the fastnesses and deadly jungles of Nepaul. They did not come in to accept the amnesty. There was no reason why they should. It was not for them. Heads of the revolt and guilty of cold-blooded murders, as well as of the blackest treachery, there was no hope of mercy held out to them; and so standing to their arms, they resolved to spin out their lives to the last thread, and sell them at the dearest price. What a contrast to this, the Gospel! Whatever be men's sins and crimes, none are excluded, by name or by character, from the amnesty which God proclaims, from the benefits of eternal life."—Words and Weapons.

New Books.

...."NO. XIII.; OR, THE STORY OF THE LOST VESTAL." By Emma Marshall. Among the statues of Vestales Maximæ in the Roman Forum, brought to light by recent explorations, is one which can be described only as Number Thirteen, since the name of the vestal in whose honor it was erected has been carefully erased. The supposition that the eminent preistess late in life embraced the Christian faith, and that in consequence some one erased her name from the statue in order that her life and especially her apostacy might be forgotten, forms the basis of this story. It working out the conjectural history of this "Lost Vestal" the writer has used with considerable skill the historical material available for her purpose, and describes in a graphic way the customs of the time both in Britain and at Rome, and portrays with a good deal of power the persecutions to which the Christians of that early day were subjected. The story is ingenious, thoughtful, rich in historical information and entertaining. It ought to serve a useful purpose as accessory to more methodical and scholarly histories. (Cassell & Co.)

...."SELECTED GEMS AND MODERN THEMES FOR PIPE AND REED ORGAN." The home player and the church organist will be alike interested in Mr. James C. Macy's latest compilation. The book is made up of preludes, postludes, festival and wedding music, marches, and a most pleasing variety of choice selections for special occasions, many of which are here introduced as organ pieces for the first time. Not too difficult for the amateur, the book is elevated in style, and will be an efficient aid to the cultivation of a pure musical taste. (Oliver Ditson & Co.)

....“A WINTER IN CENTRAL AMERICA,” by Helen J. Sanborn, is the record of a trip taken by the writer with her father, a coffee merchant of Boston, to Guatemala and Mexico. It has no claims to literary excellence, but is pleasantly written, and its information and descriptions of Guatemala, which take up two-thirds of the book, will be new to most readers. The volume is attractive in point of type, paper and binding. (Lee & Shepard.)

....“WAR AND PEACE.” A Historical Novel. By Count Tolstoi. Translated by Clara Bell. Part II. The Invasion. Two vo's. This work has been well described as a panorama rather than a novel. It consists of a succession of scenes loosely strung together, but giving a vivid picture of the various phases of Russian life. As such it is quite unexcelled either by Turgénieff or Henri Greville. Occasionally there come out some of the peculiar views of the author as to the precepts of Christianity, but for the most part he is merely a raconteur, and he does his work with great vivacity and graphic power. (W. S. Gottsberger)

....“HOUSEHOLD REMEDIES.” For the Prevalent Disorders of the Human Organism. By Felix L. Oswald, M.D. There is much practical good sense in this book, by a physician who looks to nature and domestic remedies more than to drugs for the treatment of such diseases as asthma, dyspepsia, consumption, nervous maladies, climatic disorders, etc. It is written for family use, with as little as possible of professional terms. (Fowler & Wells.)

CHILDREN'S PORTFOLIO.

“Never Start Anything You Can't Stop.”

BY HELEN PEARSON BARNARD.

“LOOK at Rob; going so fast you can see the soles of his new boots! What's up?”

Rob Kerr paused to answer the boys. “Going to ride on grandsir's engine.”

“Couldn't you squeeze us in, too? Say Rob”—

But Rob thought he heard the car bell, and was showing the soles again. The boys followed.

When they got there, Rob's grandfather, Adolph Kerr, was carefully examining the engine, oil can in hand, while Silas, the fireman, looked out of the little window.

“Hercules is all right, boss; I've looked him over myself,” said Silas.

“I know you always do,” said Mr. Kerr, “but it's my way to look over the engine myself before starting. We can't be too careful.”

“He's right,” Silas told the boys. “Ef he hadn't, reg'lar as clock-work, travelled all over the Hercules, he wouldn't be called the best engineer on the road. 'Dolph Kerr's run the longest, too.”

Rob was pleased to have the boys hear that.

“Rob, here—he'll be running the Hercules when grandsir's laid up,” added Silas.

“I could now, almost,” said Rob.

“Oh, hear him!” laughed Silas. “We may as well both lay ourselves away, boss.”

Mr. Kerr made no reply, but stepped aboard. How the boys envied Rob as he rang the bell! The conductor shouted, “All aboard!” and away they went along the iron track.

They ate supper while the train waited at a junction. Silas made coffee and boiled eggs; Rob toasted bread on the end of the boiler.

Every chance he could get, Rob was on the Hercules. All the other engineers knew Rob, the grandson of old Adolph Kerr, and never sent him away if they saw him about the engine-house. They trusted him because his grandfather did. Rob was very proud of this.

One day, when he was alone on the Hercules, two schoolmates came along.

“Grandfather away, Rob?”

“Yes, and Silas. They've left me in charge.”

“Let us get up there, too?”

“Couldn't think of it!” said Rob. “If Silas catches any boys around here he'll give them a shaking.”

“We won't stay but a minute; we'll run when we see him coming.”

“If I let you fellows aboard you'll get into mischief,” said Rob.

They promised not to touch anything. At length Rob let them come up where he was. Very soon one said, “My uncle makes engines, so I know a lot about them, too. Wouldn't it be fun to set this agoing, just a minute?”

“Rob don't dare start up!” said the other.

“I dare, but I won't!”

“What's the harm?” asked the first. “Uncle showed me how to reverse the lever.”

Rob said no; but they kept on hinting and coaxing. By-and-by Rob peered out to see if anybody was coming, a strange, guilty look on his face; then there was a familiar sound from the mighty horse—it moved slowly along the siding.

“There, didn't I know how to start it?” cried Rob.

The Hercules went faster, it seemed to be getting ready for a race.

“Now we must stop it!” cried Rob. “Reverse the lever, quick!”

But the boy had forgotton how! He jumped from the engine, telling the other to “Come on.” So Rob was alone, and in a sad fix. Pale as death, he tried with all his strength to do as he had seen his grandfather. It was useless! He had let loose a force he could not stop. He, too, jumped, throwing himself the same way the engine was going; rolled over and down the bank into the bushes.

And now there was a great cry from Silas and Mr. Kerr. With terrified faces they chased the Hercules. They were too late to get aboard; the engine had left the siding for the main road; sped along to a bend and disappeared, the ground trembling beneath its powerful tread.

Rob felt that he never could look his grandfather in the face again. He hid till dark. Then he went home. His mother was crying. And his grandfather? It seemed as if he had grown years older. Silas was there, too, talking pitifully of the Hercules as if it were some living creature that had lost its life.

“Why, here's Rob,” said Silas, “ye won't have no more fine rides with your grandsir and me! They've put us out of a job. Heard how the Hercules got away to day? Wouldn't be ketched no more'n a wild horse o' the desert; he stove up a coal train and pitched head-fust into a pasture!”

Rob was surprised that no one suspected him. “Anybody killed?” he whispered.

“All living,” was Silas's queer reply, “except your grandsir. It pretty nigh finished him.”

“Of course he'll get another engine, he's so smart,” faltered Rob.

Then his grandfather spoke, in a deep, troubled tone. “Nobody would trust the old man again, Rob. They turned him off with hard words. Oh, it's a cruel ending for the work of a lifetime!”

Tears filled his eyes; they rushed into Rob's, too. He could keep it from his grandfather no longer. He told him all. “If you'll only forgive me,” he sobbed, “and trust me as you used to, I'll never touch an engine again, never!”

It added heavily to Mr. Kerr's sorrow to find that Rob had caused their misery, but he put his arm about him and spoke kindly. “There's many other things besides engines gets the upper hands, if folks touches them,” he said. “I'd willingly suffer if I thought you'd learn this lesson: Never start anything you can't stop. There's men in this town'll tell you they started drinking and swearing long ago; and it's running away with them now, just as the Hercules did with you. Think of this, Rob, when you remember what happened to your grandsir's last engine!”

That was ten years ago. The old engineer has gone where faithful service is rewarded. Rob has become a young man, but not an engineer; he has never stepped aboard an engine since that painful experience on the Hercules.

But often in the Sunday-school class, where he is now teacher, his boys say, “Tell us the story of the wild engine!”

They listen eagerly to the end, when Robert Kerr closes with his grandfather's motto, “Never start anything you can't stop.”—Congregationalist.

Doing Errands for Christ.

“MAMMA,” said a little five-year-old boy, “I wish Jesus lived on earth now.

“Why, my darling?”

“Because I should have liked so much to have done something for Him.”

“But what could such a little bit of a fellow as you are have done for the Saviour?”

The child hesitated a few moments, then looked up into his mother's face and said: “Why, mother, I could have run on all His errands for Him.”

“So you could, my child, and so you shall. Here is a glass of jelly and some oranges I was going to send to poor old sick Margaret by the servant, but I will let you take them, instead, and do an errand for the Saviour, for when upon earth He said, ‘Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these ye did it unto me.’” So remember, children, whenever you do any kind act for anybody because you love Jesus, it is just the same as if the Saviour were now living on the earth and you were doing it for Him.—The Illustrator.

Measuring the Height of a Tree.

THERE is a very simple way of measuring the height of a tree, which can be practised by any one on a sunny day or in bright moonlight. All the apparatus that is necessary is a straight stick, of any length. Draw a circle with a radius (half the diameter) of a little less than the length of the stick. This will be done by holding one end of the stick, say two inches from its end, and moving the other end around, making the circle with a knife or a chip. Then place the stick in the ground exactly in the centre of the circle, perfectly upright, and press it down until the height of the stick is exactly the same as the radius of the circle.

When the end of the shadow of the stick exactly touches the circle, then also the shadow of the tree will be exactly in length the same measurement as its height. Of course, in such a case, the sun will be at an exact angle of 45 deg.

Measurements of this character can be best effected in the summer, when the sun is powerful, and has reached to a good height in the heavens, and when the trees are clothed with living green, so as to cast a dense shadow.

To many to whom this idea may not have occurred, it might be made annually a matter of interest thus on warm summer days to take the height of prominent trees, and so to compare growth from year to year.—Youth's Companion.

“THE BRINY.”—One of the first things a boy will do on arriving at the seashore is to taste the water, to see for himself if a whole ocean can be salt. If a box six feet deep were filled with sea-water, and allowed to evaporate under the sun, there would be two inches of salt left on the bottom. Taking the average depth of the ocean to be three miles, there would be a layer of pure salt 230 feet thick on the bed of the Atlantic. If all the seas could be dried up, there would be 1,000,000,000 cubic miles of common salt.—Selected.

The General Outlook.

....An effort is made to induce or compel the American Board to commission as missionaries candidates accepting the new theology, especially the notion of probation after death. The Board has always examined men in relation to their doctrinal views and has had a Scriptural standard of belief which it has expected a candidate to accept. Under this custom the great work of the Board during seventy five years has been accomplished, by the blessing of God. A departure from these ancient ways is now urged upon the Board. Rev. R. A. Hume, a missionary at Ahmaduszar, said two weeks ago at the alumni dinner at Andover, "we are looking to Andover to help us in our missionary work in all respects," and proceeded to indicate his meaning by saying that he desired to be able to say to the heathen that the Gospel would be preached to their ancestors in the world of spirits, and so prevent a feeling of bitterness in the hearts of his heathen hearers. The Congregationalist pertinently suggests that he can get absolute relief by accepting the belief of Universalists and declaring: "Be not cumbered with much serving; your ancestors, and you yourselves, are in the merciful hands of one Lord Jesus Christ, who by one Holy Spirit of grace will finally restore the whole family of mankind to holiness and happiness." What the outcome of this onset upon the American Board will be remains to be seen.

....The examinations and Commencement at Andover Seminary began with a sermon on June 6th. During the examinations this definition of the atonement was given: "The atonement is the sacrifice of the God-man, which satisfies the righteousness of God by expressing His abhorrence of sin and creating in man abhorrence of sin, and which satisfies the love of God by bringing to sinful man those powers by which he may repent and surrender himself in faith to God as His child." That is one of the leanest definitions of the atonement we have ever read. The Bible we read says much more than that in regard to the sacrifice of Christ.

....Advices up to May 18th have been received from Mr. and Mrs. S. W. Howland, who left this country a month or two since on their return to the mission in Ceylon. Both were in good health, and had been highly favored in their voyage, having had swift progress across the Atlantic, fine weather in England, and genial skies while in the Mediterranean and in the Red Sea, from which their letters were sent.

....The correspondent of The Advance gives a hopeful account of the Indians in Nebraska. He writes:

"Soon after my arrival in this town (Niobrara, Neb.,) a few weeks ago, I saw Standing Bear, the Ponca Chief, drive along its main street, with his family, in a wagon which was made in the workshop of Capt. Pratt's school at Carlisle, Penn. The circumstance excited my interest so that I not only accepted the invitation, proffered by the leading merchant here, to be introduced, but also began to make inquiries concerning the vast Indian population of this part of the Missouri river and its tributaries, and to visit the Indian schools in the immediate vicinity. I had heard Standing Bear speak at a meeting conducted by Gen. Armstrong, of Hampton Institute, in the Broadway Tabernacle, New York city, and I knew that he was an impressive speaker in his own tongue, but I found that he could not utter a word in English, and for an assurance of his satisfaction in the possession of a vehicle manufactured by Indian boys, I was compelled to depend upon the words of others.

"Great changes are anticipated in the condition of the Indians and of the country along the Niobrara, White and Cheyenne rivers, near their entrance to the Missouri, as the result of the enactment of the Dawes bill, already passed by the Senate, but still pending in the House of Representatives, and a brief statement of the situation, as it appears to an observer here, may advantageously be made. The surrender of reservations containing many millions of acres of fertile land must have an important effect upon the nation, for not only will the great Sioux tribe be stimulated in agriculture and other industries, by accepting land in severalty, but a vast area of some of the richest soil in America will be thrown open to white settlement. It is true that the signatures of two thirds of the Indians affected must be obtained before the measure can become operative, but the best judges here believe that the signatures will not be withheld. The wrong inflicted upon the Poncas who, a few years ago, were forced to leave their homes for the Indian Territory, in whose unaccustomed and malarial climate nearly all perished, has filled the nation with indignation. But that outrage should not be permitted to obstruct a change which the shrewdest of the remaining Poncas much desire.

"The Poncas now here are less than 200 in number, and I have paid several visits to their reservation which lies just across the Niobrara river, stretching many miles southward from the junction of that stream with the Missouri. Seldom does the eye behold a more beautiful or a more productive slope than that which they occupy, and upon which their farms of 160 acres each have already been selected. And seldom are farms found in a better state of cultivation than theirs, at least in this part of the country. I have seen them perform their work, using implements as improved as those of the white farmers, and their crops are raised with as much care as white men bestow upon theirs. 'How?' is the common salutation of a Ponca when he meets a white, and again and again have I heard the ejaculation from the lips of an Indian who was too busy to take his eyes from his work more than an instant, and who continued his labor at a time when the average white workman would have stopped to look. Their thrift should shame everyone who denies that the Indian can be incited to industry, and their prosperity is the strongest argument for the perpetuation of their system of each Indian holding his own farm.

"The Santee Agency lies about a dozen miles below Niobrara, on the Missouri, and the Santee Indians, although not as advanced as Poncas in some respects, furnish another example of the encouragement of industry by means of the distribution of land to be cultivated by each Indian as his own farm. The opening of the Santee reservation a year ago was a notable event for Nebraska, as well as for the Santees, and its result is unquestionably beneficial in every respect. The Santees have not been friendly to the whites as long as have the Poncas, and the horrible massacre perpetrated by them in Minnesota many years ago made their removal to Nebraska extremely distasteful to the white population here; but they are no longer regarded with distrust, and their progress, as evinced by the condition of the schools at the Santee Agency, has been highly gratifying."

Financial.

Tuesday, June 22d.

The imports of merchandise at this port last week were valued at $7,226,102, and the exports at $7,078,345. The export of specie amounted to $1,343,030. The export of specie is said to be due to some extent to sales of securities on English account, to realize the profit from the rise. Sterling exchange sold yesterday for $4.87 1-2 for 60 day bills and $4.89 1-2 for demand.

The report of the Associated Banks for the week showed an increase in loans of $3 804 800, in specie of $68,900, in legal tenders of $2,035,900, and in deposits of $4,184,400. The surplus of reserve received an addition of $1,058,450. The average rate for money on call was 2 per cent. Yesterday the rate varied from 1 1-2 to 3 per cent. The banks hold $66,581,500 in specie and $42,057,100 in legal tenders, and the Sub-Treasury here yesterday held $129,087,504 in coin.

Prices of wheat were reported yesterday rather better in foreign markets. The crop in Europe it is said will be below the average, others claim that the deficit will not be important. The depression in trade there and poverty of the working classes tends to reduce consumption. Quotations yesterday for July grain were: Wheat here 84 5-8, in Chicago 73 5-8; corn here 46 1-4, in Chicago 35; oats here 33 1-4, in Chicago 27 3-8. The supply of hay is large, pasture in this vicinity is excellent, the new crop promises to be abundant. Choice timothy is quoted at 80 to 85 cents, clover mixed 40 to 60. No. 1 rye straw is worth from 85 to 90 cents, oat straw 35 to 40, and wheat straw 25 to 35. Closing quotations for cotton yesterday were: July 9.13-14, Aug. 9 26, Sept. 9.13-14, Oct. 9.3-4, Nov. 8.88-99, Dec. 9.1-2.

Values rose in the Stock Market last week, but large sales were made to realize yesterday and prices were somewhat depressed. Buying by outsiders is moderate. Railroad bonds generally are strong. A feature last week was the taking by dealers of a new New York city water loan, due in 1904, being $2,000 000 at 3 per cent. The bids amounted to nearly $14 000,000. The loan was taken at 105.03 and 105.35, and is selling at 107. It is free of tax. The Union Pacific Company sold 4 millions in St. Joseph and Grand Island bonds, at a price not reported, and reduced its floating debt to a corresponding amount.

The clearances of the week show an increase of trade over last year of about 25 per cent.

The visible supply of wheat, reported yesterday afternoon, shows a decline of 1,500,000 bushels.

Market Report.

Review of the New York Market for Butter, Cheese, etc. Reported by DAVID W. LEWIS & Co., Produce Commission Merchants, 49 Pearl St., New York.
Commission on Butter, Eggs, Poultry, etc., is five per cent; Flour, Grain, etc., 2½ per cent.
Marking-plates furnished when desired.

NEW YORK, June 19, 1886.

BUTTER.—Receipts for the week, 52,038 pks.; exports 1,426 pks.

There have been plentiful local rains throughout the Eastern and Middle States. Feed has been fine and milk plentiful all over, and prices for butter for the week are a trifle lower, with the receipts of butter larger than ever before known. Prices are low and money cheap and ice plenty. Refrigerator storage at a guaranteed temperature of 40 deg. may be had in this town at one-fifth of one cent a pound per month. Extra Western creamery June made butter sold here Friday at 17½c., and 100 tubs of June made Western firsts sold at 15c. If holding at these prices for three or four months will pay the interest and storage and a fair premium for the risk and employment, then a needed service will be rendered by buying stock now and carrying it forward to a period of greater needs. As a point of fact, there is quite a good deal of such buying here and in Boston, and considerable packing down and holding in the country as well. We quote:

Fancy creamery	17½@18
do dairy (selections)	15½@16
Good to fine	13 @15
Poor to common	7 @12½

CHEESE.—Receipts for the week, 61,633 boxes; exports 54,058 boxes.

The market opened on Tuesday at 7¼a7⅜ for fancy, and slowly declined until Friday, when 7a 7½c. was top for colored and 7¼c. for white. Night milk skims when perfect sold at 5a5¼c., but most of the arrivals were off in quality and sold at 4a4½c. Full skims are hardly saleable at any price, in some cases not bringing enough to pay freight and boxes. We quote:

Factory, white, full cream, finest	7⅛@ 7¼
" colored, " "	7 @ 7⅛
" good to fine "	6 @ 6¾
" skims	1 @ 5

EGGS.—Receipts for the week were 17,457 bbls.

There is a better trading and slightly higher prices at the close. Finest marks of near-by eggs are not plentiful and are wanted at quotations. Sales on 'Change to-day, Saturday, of 50 cases Ohio, seller this P.M., at 12c. We quote:

Near-by marks, fresh eggs	13 @14
Western and Canada	11½@12

Sore Eyes

The eyes are always in sympathy with the body, and afford an excellent index of its condition. When the eyes become weak, and the lids inflamed and sore, it is an evidence that the system has become disordered by Scrofula, for which Ayer's Sarsaparilla is the best known remedy.

Scrofula, which produced a painful inflammation in my eyes, caused me much suffering for a number of years. By the advice of a physician I commenced taking Ayer's Sarsaparilla. After using this medicine a short time I was completely

For a number of years I was troubled with a humor in my eyes, and was unable to obtain any relief until I commenced using Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has effected a complete cure, and I believe it to be the best of blood purifiers.—C. E. Upton, Nashua, N. H.

From childhood, and until within a few months, I have been afflicted with Weak and Sore Eyes. I have used for these complaints, with beneficial results, Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and consider it a great blood purifier.—Mrs. C. Phillips, Glover, Vt.

I suffered for a year with inflammation in my left eye. Three ulcers formed on the ball, depriving me of sight, and causing great pain. After trying many other remedies, to no purpose, I was finally induced to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and,

My daughter, ten years old, was afflicted with Scrofulous Sore Eyes. During the last two years she never saw light of any kind. Physicians of the highest standing exerted their skill, but with no permanent success. On the recommendation of a friend I purchased a bottle of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which my daughter commenced taking. Before she had used the third bottle her sight was restored, and she can now look steadily at a brilliant light without pain. Her cure is complete.—W. E. Sutherland, Evangelist, Shelby City, Ky.

Precious Promises.

THERE'S a promise, O, how precious!
For the sin-stained soul to know;
Pouring o'er his guilt and vileness,
Cleansing with its crimson flow.
Though your sins they be as scarlet,
I will make them white as snow.

There's a promise, O, how precious!
When by care and sorrow pressed;
Lifting all life's weary burdens,
From the worn and troubled breast.
Come to me, all ye that labor,
And I'll surely give you rest.

There's a promise, O, how precious!
'Midst the storms of life's wild sea;
Sounding sweet above the tumult,
Bidding doubt and fear to flee.
In perfect peace will keep thee,
If you'll stay your mind on me.

There's a promise, O, how precious!
When you reach the Jordan's side;
Gleaming o'er the surging billows,
As you face its death-cold tide.
When thou passeth through the waters,
I will close by thee abide.

There's a promise, O, how precious!
Rising 'bove the billows roar;
Shining through the mists and shadows,
That conceal the heavenly shore.
In my Father's house in glory,
Thou shalt dwell forevermore.

Christianity in Japan.

BY A JAPANESE GENTLEMAN.

THE Japanese gentleman fills two pages of the Japan Weekly Mail with a catalogue of what he considers defects in the nature of the Christian work as recently conducted in the Empire, attending each item with a declaration of what he thinks ought to be done. His position being nearly that occupied by Unitarians or those calling themselves liberal Christians, it is not necessary to repeat his words here. Besides, he gives a summary of his views in a concluding paragraph, which is as follows:

It would be a disgrace to our national honor to rely entirely upon the philanthrophic people of Europe and America for the prosecution of evangelical work in our own land. True, at present the number of native believers being comparatively small, and further most of them being poor, it is inevitable that we should look to the people of the West for assistance in the shape of both men and money. But our ultimate aim must be to be independent of Western nations. In advocating the necessity of cutting off our connection with them in religious matters, I am not actuated simply by a spirit of patriotism. I have a far deeper and worthier object in view; namely the establishment in this country of a Church of Christ, based on the simple truths of the Bible, imbued with the unsophisticated faith of the Christians of the apostolic ages, free from the dogmas that have accumulated in the theological literature of the West, and untainted with the unwholesome spirit of sectarian jealousies and contention, of which the past history of Christianity contains so many instances in Europe and America. Japan is eminently fitted for the formation of such a Church. Here are more than thirty-seven millions of people, whose history has been entirely distinct from that of Western nations; who have no sympathies with the sectarian strifes and animosities that so disfigure the history of European peoples; and who, or at least the educated portion of whom, are peculiarly rationalistic in matters of religion. To these people the truths of modern science have been and are being brought in their most advanced form. Guided by the light of those scientific truths, it will be possible, if only we native believers work in the right direction, to erect among us a noble temple of the Christian God, unpolluted by the narrow, selfish, and ungodly passions of mutual jealousy, and undisgraced by human ignorance and bigotry. Whether or no such a Church is to rise up here for the first time in the history of the modern world, depends upon whether or no we, the first generation of Christian believers, prepare the way in the right direction; whether we free ourselves from the spirit of sectarian narrowness and intolerance and all the feelings of animosity which have been transmitted by the past history of Western nations, and which have taken an apparently ineradicable hold upon the minds of the people in Europe and America. These ideas seem to have already occurred to many of my fellow countrymen. At any rate, the question of the unification of churches is taking a practical form. Recently a circular letter was addressed to all the Protestant churches throughout the country, urging upon them the necessity of uniting in one Church, which should be called the Church of Japan. The letter was signed by all the leading native pastors in the Capital, and no doubt their influence over the native believers is strong enough to insure at least partial, if not entire, success. In a few weeks the result of this movement will have been partly ascertained. That it has been set on foot is a matter for sincere rejoicing. At the same time, I cannot but observe that it will be of little value to unite in one Church if feelings and opinions which, though at variance with the true spirit and teachings of the Bible, have been developed by centuries of sectarian strife and religious war and bequeathed to Japanese believers by foreign missionaries, are suffered to survive in the minds of the numbers of that Church. What is really necessary is that we should cut ourselves entirely free from the history of Christianity in the West and begin a new experience, on an entirely new and enlightened basis—a basis laid in the Bible and preserved from decay by the healthy light of modern science.

THE REPLY.

The "Japanese Gentleman" accuses the missionaries of presenting a view of Christianity not rational, not in agreement with the discoveries of science, and condemns the "intolerant and superstitious side of the narrow orthodoxy of many foreign missionaries," The Christian, the journal of the native Christian churches, quotes largely from the articles in the Mail, introducing them with these comments:

"The writer advocates 'Christianization of the upper classes' through the sending to Japan of more highly educated missionaries or laymen and the speedy establishment of a national Christian Church based on non-sectarian lines. We regret that we have so limited a space for the discussion of such subjects in English as the one now in review, for its importance is undeniable. We shall content ourselves, however, by saying that while we firmly believe a National Christian Church would be a great desideratum, we are not by any means sure that the country is to be Christianized through the 'upper classes.' Christianity of this kind very often becomes a mere fashion, while that which finds a productive soil among the common people is sure to be more sincere and lasting. In religious opinion Japan has too long followed in beaten footpaths of thought, a few leading or guiding the masses, as in the days of the Roman Catholic priesthood in Italy, Spain and France. We would, therefore, hold to the opinion that work among the young and rising generation, whether it be of the 'higher classes' or lower classes is more likely to lead to a speedy Christianization of the country than contention with those who have set themselves behind a bulwark of misapplied science or modern skepticism. Christianity is not a mere belief, it is an experience, a new existence, which no amount of scientific learning can give a man who is not willing to live it. What we want is the Lord Jesus Christ in our hearts, a living reality, and this can be had by the poorest inhabitants in the land as well as by the highest.

"As to the criticism upon the character and education of missionaries sent to Japan, we can only say that it is an unfair one, and that while we do not hold that there are none who may be deserving of criticism, we do believe that this is not the way to effect the changes desired. Those who think they see these faults should labor the harder themselves, being thankful for what they themselves have received, and as they have received, so to give others, bearing fruits an hundred fold for every seed sown. There is certainly no surer means of raising what is worse than the 'sectarian distrust and strife' our writer so much deplores than to excite in this way distrust of those who have been our teachers."

THE proud man hath no God; the envious man hath no neighbor; the angry man hath not himself. What good, then, in being a man, if one has neither himself nor a neighbor nor God?—Bishop Hall.

INTRODUCTION.

THE healing of this blind man marks one of the great crises in the life of Jesus. From the time of the assault recorded in the last chapter He gave Himself more and more exclusively to the work of preparing His disciples for the rapidly approaching catastrophe, which was to try their faith so severely. The miracles and parables, or discourses, that follow, are intended for the confirmation of the faith, rather than for a means of arousing interest and awakening faith. In order to appreciate the details of this story, we must remember that Jesus had just escaped from the mob; that His disciples were fearful for His safety and their own, and were probably urging Him to make haste and find a safe retreat. The presence of the blind man was to their minds a serious interference with their plans, and involved, as they thought, the Master in the danger of being overtaken by His mad pursuers.

THE LESSON.

I. THE BLIND MAN AND JESUS.—VS. 1-7.

V. 1.—"And as Jesus passed by." Some do not connect this event closely with the preceding chapter, but the more evident meaning of the words seems to demand such a connection. It was after Jesus had passed out from the crowd of enemies in the temple, and had reached the outer gates of the temple or even of the city, that He saw a man who instantly attracted His attention and interrupted His progress. "A man which was blind from his birth." We learn later on that this man was a beggar, and, with the acute hearing of the blind, he had doubtless noticed the passing by of Jesus and His companions, and had asked an alms.

V. 2.—"Master, who did sin?" Many among the Jews were like the friends of Job, ready to assign some specific sin as the cause of every particular affliction. As this man had been a life long sufferer, it was difficult to decide concerning his sin. The only alternative that presented itself to the minds of the disciples, was that in some way his sufferings, were associated with some sin of his, committed either in embryo, or in a previous state of existence, or that they had been entailed upon him in consequence of his parents' sins.

V. 3.—"Neither hath this man sinned nor his parents." Jesus did not intend to declare that these persons were free from sin, but simply that this blindness, while a part of the general misery caused by sin, was not assignable as a punishment to any particular offence. "But that the works of God should be manifest in him." This miracle, with the comments of Jesus, reaffirms and illustrates the lesson of the book of Job, which the Jews had forgotten. This affliction was a step in the man's ultimate welfare, which God had ordered for His own glory, the eternal blessedness of the sufferer, and the enlightenment of His disciples. Here was a grander meaning connected with suffering than any weighing of sin and penalty according to the judgment of man.

V. 4.—"I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day." The Revision substitutes "We" for "I" in this place. By using the plural Jesus associates His disciples with Himself in this case, and indicates what is to be expected of them in the future. Here was a work of God to be done, and no question of haste on account of personal peril was to interfere with the doing of it. The "day" referred to by Jesus is evidently His life time; the one occasion when He could work this particular kind of work. So long as life lasted He would go about doing good.

V. 5—"As long as I am in the world I am the light of the world." The sun moves in the heavens for the purpose of giving light. Jesus came to earth to unstop the deaf ears and to open the eyes of the blind. The need was before Him in the person of this man, and He would deny Himself if He should refuse to speak the creative word, "Let light be." Jesus is still the light of the world, but only as He is in the world through the influence of the Spirit and the lives of His people.

V. 6.—"When he had thus spoken." These last words were probably intended for the blind man as well as for the disciples. They served to arouse expectation on his part. "He spat on the ground," etc. Jesus employed these instruments, not because He was dependent on them, but in order to teach a lesson by them. The spittle, the clay, and the water, were each regarded as remedial agents; but this case of congenital blindness was plainly beyond their sphere of action. By using them Jesus taught that He was able to make the weak things of the world to confound the mighty. His disciples were as powerless to disciple all nations, as these instruments were powerless to open the blind eyes, yet in both cases Jesus gave power to the weak, and made the inefficient effective.

V. 7.—"Go, wash in the pool of Siloam." This pool was fed by the spring in the temple hill, and Jesus thus made these waters, held as sacred by the Jews, to coöperate with Him in this work of healing. The name of the pool, which John interprets for his Gentile readers, corresponds somewhat with the titles of Jesus as the Shiloh, the peace, and the Sent of the Father. "He went his way, therefore, and washed and came seeing." We see the faith of this man manifesting itself in immediate obedience, and receiving the reward of sight.

II. THE BLIND MAN AND HIS NEIGHBORS —VS. 8–12.

V. 8.—"Is not this he that sat and begged?" The man appears to have returned to his home to show what great things the Lord had done for him. As he walked along with head erect, and confident step, those who had been accustomed to his timid, cautious movements were amazed. The change wrought in him was at once a matter of discussion.

V. 9.—"Some said this is he." Familiar with his appearance they were satisfied as to his identity. "Others said, he is like him." These were disposed to be on the safe side; they would neither affirm nor deny. "He said, I am he." His personal testimony settled the point. No one knows what a change Jesus works in a man so well as the man himself, and his testimony, when honest, is of the greatest value as a witness for the Lord.

V. 10—"How were thine eyes opened?" Some intimation of the truth had probably entered their minds when they first noticed the change in his appearance. Some perhaps were expecting to hear that which would confirm their faith in Jesus, while others were hoping for that which would feed their enmity and justify their opposition.

V. 11.—The answer of the man to this question was straightforward and explicit. He stated simply that which he himself knew. We have here a simple recital of facts without note or comment.

V. 12—"Where is he?" It is hard to understand the motive which prompted this question. Curiosity, malice, and wavering faith were doubtless combined or struggling one with the other for mastery.

III. THE BLIND MAN AND THE PHARISEES.—VS. 13–17.

V. 13.—"They brought to the Pharisees him that aforetime was blind." This may have been on the same Sabbath day, or on some day in the week following. It was not customary for the Sanhedrin to hold trials on the Sabbath.

V. 14—"It was the Sabbath day when Jesus made the clay, and opened his eyes." Alongside of the miracle which blessed a suffering man for time and eternity, there stood the fact that the act of making clay and anointing the eyes was contrary to the "Traditions of the Elders."

V. 15.—"Then again the Pharisees asked him, how he had received his sight." They had doubtless heard the story from those who brought the man before them as particeps criminis. They now sought a statement from his lips which might either discredit the alleged miracle or condemn Jesus as a law breaker. His answer to the Pharisees differed in no material point from that given to his neighbors.

V. 16.—In this verse we have a striking illustration of the different ways in which men view the same facts. "This man is not of God, because he keepeth not the Sabbath day" He is condemned immediately, because His action violates their prejudices. "How can a man who is a sinner, do such miracles?" Here is not an open defence, so much as a plea for justice and a careful examination. If the facts can be proven, our prejudices must go.

V. 17.—"What sayest thou of him?" They ask this question in order to evade the responsibility of settling the dispute that had arisen, and, perhaps, to obtain such a confession of faith as would seem to justify them in condemning him as well as his benefactor. "He said, He is a prophet." Not yet ready to recognize him as the Messiah, he knows "that no man can do such miracles except God be with him." This man's faith grew clearer and stronger until at last he saw and accepted the man Jesus as the Son of God.

LESSONS FOR TO-DAY.

1. Be on the lookout for opportunities of service.

2. The discipline of life has blessings in store.

3 Jesus associates us with Himself in His work.

4. "Ye are the light of the world."

5. Let God's work in you be seen by those around you.

6. A blind heart is worse than sightless eyes.

7. Prejudice causes blindness; faith brings sight.

8. "Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law."

"The Little Shoes---They Did It All."

"ONE night on the verge of ruin,
As I hurried from the tap,
I beheld the landlord's baby
Still on its mother's lap.
'Look here, dear father,' said the mother,
Holding forth the little feet,
'Look, we've got new shoes for darling!
Don't you think them nice and neat?'
You may judge the thing was simple—
Disbelieve me if you choose;
But, my friends, no fist e'er struck me
Such a blow as those small shoes.
And they forced my brain to reason;
'What right,' said I, standing there,
'Have I to clothe another's children,
And to let my own go bare?'
It was in the depth of winter;
Bitter was the night and wild;
And outside the flaring gin-shop
Stood my starving wife and child.
Out I went and clutched my baby,
Saw its feet so cold and blue:
Fathers! if the small shoe smote me,
What did those poor bare feet do?
Quick I thrust them in my bosom!
Oh, they were so icy chill!
And their coldness like a dagger
Pierced me. I can feel it still.
Of money, I had but a trifle,
Just enough to serve my stead;
It bought shoes for little baby,
And a single loaf of bread.
The loaf served us all the Sunday,
And I went to work next day;
Since that time I have been teetotal.
That is all I've got to say. —Selected.

A THREE-YEAR OLD Philadelphian had heard her parents discuss hygiene until her infant mind was soaked with the subject. One day her dear, old grandmother said—meaning to give Bessie a piece of cake—"Bessie, what do you always have after your bath?" The child regarded her grandmother for a moment with inquiring eyes, and then replied: "Reaction."

Horsford's Acid Phosphate.
Specific Virtues in Dyspepsia.

Dr. A JENKINS, Great Falls, N. H., says: "I can testify to its seemingly almost specific virtues in cases of dyspepsia, nervousness and morbid vigilance or wakefulness."

DYSPEPSIA

Causes its victims to be miserable, hopeless, confused, and depressed in mind, very irritable, languid, and drowsy. It is a disease which does not get well of itself. It requires careful, persistent attention, and a remedy to throw off the causes and tone up the digestive organs till they perform their duties willingly. Hood's Sarsaparilla has proven just the required remedy in hundreds of cases.

"I have taken Hood's Sarsaparilla for dyspepsia, from which I have suffered two years. I tried many other medicines, but none proved so satisfactory as Hood's Sarsaparilla." THOMAS COOK, Brush Electric Light Co., New York City.

Sick Headache

"For the past two years I have been afflicted with severe headaches and dyspepsia. I was induced to try Hood's Sarsaparilla, and have found great relief. I cheerfully recommend it to all." MRS. E. F. ANNABLE, New Haven, Conn.

Mrs. Mary C. Smith, Cambridgeport, Mass., was a sufferer from dyspepsia and sick headache. She took Hood's Sarsaparilla and found it the best remedy she ever used.

THE MURDERING goes on. Small worth is attached to life. The killing is not marked by periodicity, it has become a social habit—a prominent and repulsive characteristic of American life. All classes are affected, from the educated son of a Presbyterian minister to Sullivan, the slugger, trained to brutality. One reason is, the Church has not taught boldly and clearly the fear of God and the certainty of retribution in eternity.

FOR A FEW WEEKS, while reporting the acts of the General Synod, and now the Commencement of Rutgers College, items of news from the churches have of necessity been held over from week to week. We have to-day in hand about two columns of such items, which we hope to print next week. It is probable that in making selections rapidly and under compulsion we have not been wise in every instance; but it is certain that a disposition to be partial has not prompted a single choice.

ON A PLATFORM on Commencement day were: the President, a D.D., and also an LL.D., having accepted the degrees from the Trustees of another college; on each side of this central figure two or three Professors, also D.D.'s, the degree having been accepted from a Board of Trustees; around this august body a deep semicircle of gentlemen—Trustees, patrons, friends—many of them D.D.'s, having accepted the title from the Trustees of various colleges. When the degrees were conferred from the platform now in view, one or more gentlemen received a Ph.D., or an LL.D., or some other honorary title, but not one D.D. was announced. The gentlemen on that platform take to themselves great credit for having abandoned a practice very much abused; that is, certain disappointed gentlemen and certain writers for the press have said that it has been much abused. Very well; but having accepted the degree for themselves and inasmuch as they still allow it to be printed at the end of their names, with what degree of consistency or propriety can they refuse to confer D.D.'s on men as worthy as themselves? Because the title is sometimes unhappily bestowed is no valid reason why it should not be voted to those who unquestionably deserve it. Either drop your own titles, gentlemen, or give the same honorable distinction to those worthy of it! Under the circumstances, your complacency in being above such action is a trifle ridiculous.

AT THE annual meeting of the Congregational Home Missionary Society held a fort night ago, men whose opinions ought to have a great deal of influence with all Christian people and indeed with all sensible men, insisted repeatedly that one chief motive for the performance of evangelistic work should be that it is the will of God. God commands it, appoints it, gives it to us to do, calls us to it, endows us with the gifts of grace that we may do it, and, therefore, we ought to do it. It was wise and right to insist on such a motive. The members of Christian churches are to be obedient to God in the first place. Men and women who profess to believe the Bible are to obey the Bible. Although obedience may be toilsome, may for a long time seem fruitless, may lead to abuse from men, to loss and suffering, still God's children are to do God's will The Church needs and ought to have a supreme regard for the will of God. Believers have had it in the past. Men and women have in heroic obedience to God persisted in proclaiming His word, in urging it upon the attention of their fellows, notwithstanding misrepresentation and false accusations and opprobrium and malicious assaults; have endured the loss of all earthly possessions; endured torture, suffering, a painful death—death as condemned malefactors, and at this cost, the work of God has been carried onward again and again in the world, the Church of Christ has been kept alive, God's truth has been commended, and the power of the grace of God has been gloriously exhibited. The ease-loving, self seeking Christians of to day need to be reminded of this duty of obedience. There are many in the Church who are not the willing and obedient servants of God. Before them the work God is calling His Church to do to day should be held up as their duty, to be discharged because it is the will of God. Christians are to keep the Sabbath day holy, because it is God's will; to avoid even the appearance of evil, because it is God's will; to take up the cross and follow Christ, because it is God's will; to preach the Gospel to every creature, because it is God's will. In keeping His commandments there is "great reward."

BACCALAUREATE SERMONS.—A prominent and gratifying feature of these sermons, preached on the last two Sabbaths at different educational centres, is the emphasis put upon the importance of thoroughly permeating all College life with the pure and elevating spirit of Christianity. Notable in this respect, was the sermon by President Porter of Yale, who vigorously maintained the Christian theory against the secular, which in recent years, both in this country and in Europe, has gathered quite a number of advocates who hold that education in all its grades should have no alliance with religion; should profess no allegiance to religious creeds; should dispense with positive religious influences, leaving all teaching and training in religion to the family and the Church.

Dr. Porter defended the old theory as contrasted with the new, strongly arguing that the ideal college should be Christian, to supplement the functions of the family and the Church, to elevate and improve the quality of our science and culture, to counteract the evil tendencies active in both, and to keep out false religion. His utterances have the true ring, and are distinctly echoed in most of the Baccalaureate discourses. In no college are the great principles of the Christian religion more strictly adhered to and thoroughly expounded than at Rutgers.

THE IMMIGRATION.—Only forty years ago the lands west of a line drawn from north to south between Buffalo and Detroit were sparsely occupied. To day the good lands between such a line and the Mississippi river are so taken up that the young people of the Northern States included in that area are migrating to Minnesota, Dakota and contiguous States and Territories to obtain farms at a price within their means. Do we not need the remainder of the public domain, becoming very limited in the Northern States, for the children of those who are to day citizens of the United States? If the remaining territory is absorbed by immigrants as it has been for twenty years past what will be left twenty years hence for the children of American citizens?

Furthermore, it is reckoned that from half a million to a million of workingmen are to-day out of employment in the United States. Yet we are importing from Europe about a thousand persons a day, the majority of whom belong to the working classes. Are we acting wisely? Ought we not to do something to discourage immigration?

Besides, have we not just now on our hands about as much imported Romanism, irreligion, infidelity, socialism and communism as we can attend to for twenty years to come?

Rutgers College.

BUT for the depressing effect of the storm on Tuesday and Wednesday of last week, there would probably have been a larger attendance upon the Commencement exercises at New Brunswick, and more noisy manifestations of interest and approbation, which some people enjoy and others do not. As it was, the number present on such a rainy day as Wednesday was a clear proof of the hearty and general interest felt in the College. The audience was a representative one, and had come from widely separated localities.

The young men of the graduating class performed their respective parts with enthusiasm, the literary excellence of their orations and their oratory coming fully up to the established high standard. The class of '86 is the first that has taken a full course of four years under the present administration. It was the Freshman Class when President Gates entered upon his duties; and surely he, and those associated with him in the Faculty, may well be satisfied with the results of their work, pleased with the testimony given by these young men to the thoroughness of the training they had received, and gratified with the honor reflected by the class upon the College.

Despite the hard things recently alleged against the administration, the facts as we gathered them and the manifest signs of vigorous life and prosperity as we saw them, were sufficient, in our judgment, to stamp the published reports as wholly untrue and cruelly unjust. The concealed source of these attacks is probably to be found in the keynote sounded by the present administration from its very beginning to the present time, and which it will insist on to the end, namely, thorough work or no work on the part of both professors and students—the student must study or stop; and if now and then one is found who prefers to do neither, but who is not allowed to enjoy his preference, is it to be wondered at if an angry antagonism is excited and vituperation indulged in?

It is reasonable to expect that with a change of administration anywhere, in anything, there should be a change of methods of operation, and even of principles of action. This holds true whether applied to the government of a college or of a country. All acquainted with the recent history of Rutgers College know that with the inauguration of President Gates, four years ago, a new departure was taken in several important respects. The distinctive aim was declared to be quality rather than quantity; and though this high and laudable aim led at first to the thinning out of the ranks, yet at the beginning of the last collegiate year forty-six new students,—a larger number than for many years previous,—were admitted; and in the coming fall the accession will be still greater. More stress has been put upon the study of the modern languages than formerly, while the classics have not been neglected, but have received closer attention; also, German and French text-books on subjects of science have been introduced with a view to gaining a useful familiarity with those tongues.

We found abundant evidence that the College is making fine progress in many particulars. Since the last Commencement valuable additions have been made to the library and to the philosophical and scientific apparatus; the librarian, Mr. I. S. Upson, through his indefatigable labors, has published a quinquennial catalogue of the officers and students of the College; the privileges of the Sage Library, of the Theological Seminary, numbering over 37,000 volumes, until recently enjoyed exclusively by the theological students, have been extended to the College students, and a reading-room, liberally supplied with papers and periodicals, has been opened. These are only a few of the improvements noticeable as being of increased advantage to the students at Rutgers.

Never before in its history has the College enjoyed so bright a financial outlook. The total endowment fund actually paid in, including the Pruyn Library Fund, is $80,000. The friends and alumni during the last year responded to the efforts of President Gates to make the income meet the expenses by subscribing a sum amounting to from $7,000 to $10,000 a year for five years to come, as the needs of the College require, so that now for the first time in ten years there is a balance in the treasury after all demands are satisfied. The announcement of this fact at the alumni meeting was received with enthusiastic applause.

Surviving members of the Class of '36 reached across the half century and clasped hands with the Class of '86,—an impressive characteristic of the Commencement. The fifty years thus spanned have been marked by great advances in the arts and sciences, in invention and discovery, which give to the young men of '86 advantages that the young men of '36 did not enjoy, and which are generously provided at Rutgers. If any young man leaves the institution not abreast with the march of the times the reason will be in himself and not in the College.

"Old Colony" Papers.

ENGLAND'S UPHARSIN. . . . THE POWER OF PUBLIC OPINION. . . . THE MAD KING OF BAVARIA.

I AM not aware that a drop of English blood runs in my veins, but I love England above all nations except my own, held to her by a spiritual and intellectual kinsmanship which is thicker than blood. Neither have I the least consanguinity with Ireland, nor am I a particular admirer of that people, but the contrary. But I recognize the fact that the whole policy of England towards Ireland has been a colossal and persistent blunder, and as such a crime.

When Henry II. appeared, the people, distracted and oppressed by petty princes, were ready to welcome him as a deliverer; and peaceful possession and a homogeneous kingdom might have been secured. But his lieutenants and his son John chose to regard it as a conquered country and a field for spoliation. Instead of making the yoke appear easy and the burden light, by permitting the Irish to retain their language and customs and local government, the offices were by formal decree, in the time of Edward III., restricted to Englishmen who "had no personal interest whatever in Ireland," marriage between the two races was prohibited, and even trading with the natives was made treasonable. The natural tendency was to rapidly absorb and assimilate the English element into the Irish. The entire policy adopted was to counteract this, and Anglicize everything. This was the direct reverse of what has been allowed to take place in Scotland and Wales, and in England itself under the Normans. It was the policy of Russia in reference to Poland, and with the same results. Dublin has well been styled "England's Warsaw." This course was relentlessly followed up under Edward IV., Richard II. and the Henrys. Elizabeth crowned this stupid and wicked policy by attempting to force the Reformation at the point of the bayonet, at the cost of two hundred thousand lives; introducing the bitterness of religious detestation into the Irish heart. The world has probably never witnessed scenes of greater horror, cruelty and barbarity than in those civil wars, and no country was ever more thoroughly devastated. The fields of food were destroyed, and it was a common sight to see the people lying dead in the towns and in the country from starvation. Then came Cromwell, determined to complete the conquest forever. At Drogheda and at Wexford the entire garrison, including thousands of men, was put to the sword. In both cases no quarter was shown, by his express orders; and in the former case he refused to ratify the promise of quarter given by his officers, though the surrender was made on that condition.

Upon this scene of blood and desolation the attempt was made to establish an English régime by colonization. James I. had begun the work, and now Cromwell confiscated four-fifths of the soil and gave it into English hands. Still more confiscation followed the Battle of the Boyne, and the 18th century was one long relentless tyranny and persecution. Even yet Ireland might have been pacified and won, if the movement of Grattan (himself a Protestant, and enlisting most of the Protestants) had been met in a wise and liberal spirit, instead of by a course which goaded the Irish into a revolt, which it cost England two hundred million pounds to subdue, and the loss of 70,000 men on both sides. It was upon the smoking and blood-stained foundations of this delusive "peace," that the present "Union" was forcibly constructed in 1801 against the protests of Grattan and those whom he represented. It was an arrangement all on one side, and under it Ireland has been governed wholly for the benefit of England. Sir Robert Peel admitted, thirty years after, that scarcely for one year had the country been governed by ordinary course of law. It has been hardly better since.

With the rise of Daniel O'Connell dates the gradual conviction of the Irish, that their best field is the political; and of the English, that their system has been a faulty one, till now the universal admission has been wrung from them that "coercion" has been a failure. One by one concessions have been made, such as Catholic Emancipation, the modification of the tithe tax to the Established Church, parliamentary, municipal, land-tenure, and poor-law reform, a system of national education, the re-organization of the constabulary, and the disestablishment of the Anglican Church. But these relaxations of despotism were made with such reluctance and poor grace as to defeat the object of conciliation, and were so alternated with repressive measures as to give the Irish people the impression of their having been extorted rather than conceded.

The Home Rule movement was initiated thirteen years ago, and has been conducted in a masterly way by the genius of Mr. Parnell, till the late elections for Parliament showed his party to hold the balance of power. The English nation has been forced to face the problem and to lay everything else aside till a solution shall be found. The only remaining question is, whether the old stupid sullen blunder of doing things by halves, and too late, is to be repeated. The question is, whether the English people have learned wisdom enough to ask what will satisfy the Irish, instead of what they think ought to satisfy them. The question is, whether the bitter experience of seven centuries of severity and suspicion has inclined them to try what a generous confidence and justice will effect. The question is, as seen by the whole world outside of England, whether she is the Christian nation which she professes to be, in spirit and in truth. I confess that I tremble for England, when I consider that God is just. It is her golden opportunity of redressing the wrong of seven hundred years, and erasing the darkest blot on her escutcheon. If she fails now, I shall fear to see the handwriting on her walls.

The remarkable progress of the Home Rule movement is a culminating instance of the rapidly growing pressure of public opinion in these days, making "agitation" by means of the press and the ballot so much mightier than brute force, or even laws or traditions, than institutions or prejudices or fashions. The same was shown by the anti slavery movement in this country, and is now being shown in the Temperance movement. And one of the mistakes of the Garrisonian Abolitionists, which made them obstacles to the cause, was their refusal to vote and their persistent repulse of the sympathy and coöperation of the press, the pulpits and the politicians. The defeat of various bad measures in the present Legislature, or by the Governor, of this State has been due to the same steady pressure, as also the stirring up of the department of justice in this city to proceed against men like Fish and Buddensiek and the Aldermen of '84.

Scarcely less striking illustrations are furnished by the sudden collapse of the skating rinks, and the rapid disappearance of song-birds from the bonnets of respectable and self respecting women. When England has settled the Irish question, if not before, let us hope that she will contemplate another discreditable fact,—that she imports annually ten million dollars' worth of birds and feathers (of which the ostrich feathers alone do not involve the slaughter of the birds); also, that England and France annually import 250 000 humming-birds, and a million and a quarter of other birds for decorative purposes.

How paltry, after all, such displays of luxurious and picturesque tastes are when compared with the career of that modern would be Sardanapalus, Haroun al Raschid, and the Grand Turk,—King Ludwig of Bavaria. He was a Monte Christo, but alas! without the wealth, and therefore soon came to the end of his purse, and with it of all that made life seem worth living. So he plunged into the deep tarn of Starnberg, whose shores he had transformed into a weird wonder land, and made his dramatic exit from a world which he had tried to regard only from the spectacular point of view.

In him the imagination was a disease, and became an insanity. He sought to realize for himself what poets and romancers have written to beguile us, for a few moments of illusion, out of the commonplace of daily life. He had as little to do as possible with actual men and affairs, communicating with his servants at a distance by signs, wandering alone through the forest and the palace, sitting absolutely alone in the theatre and the opera, driving out only at night and then in a swan shaped chariot, with india rubber tires, rendered transparent and dazzling by electric light, bursting upon the view with startling suddenness and at break-neck speed. His appearances and disappearances, like his final one, were as mysterious and theatrical as those of the stage. His palaces, of which he had six or seven, were as fantastic and picture-like as reckless expenditure and the resources of science and art could make them. Gilt balconies, diamond-studded chandeliers, and roof-gardens a la Semiramis; pleasure grounds and landscapes, presenting an endless succession of wonders and fairy like scenes; artificial lakes, on which he sailed at night in a shell shaped boat drawn by swans, while strains of music and clouds of fragrance and cunning arrangements of light and artificial breezes conspired to the most dreamlike effects; caverns, reached by tunnels and as glittering and whimsical as a scene from the Arabian Nights. He lavished a fortune on Wagner and his operas alone, and was a monomaniac on the subject of music, his one inseparable companion being his piano, and the atmosphere about him being kept like an æolian harp ready to vibrate mysterious and enchanted harmonies.

It was a strange existence of self illusion, and yet one which many practice on a smaller scale, and which perhaps all of us indulge to some extent, having a little theatre and fairy land somewhere in our minds. And when kept under control and within the bounds of our income, it is a blessed resource. But the poor king's career was a most pathetic one, after all, as must be every attempt to find in this land of shadows those ideals of beauty and scenes of beatitude which are reserved for the Paradise of God.

How to Study and Teach the Scriptures.

BY REV. WM. W. CLARK.

An Address delivered at the N. Y. State Sunday-School Convention held at Buffalo, June 8–10, and reported by the Buffalo Express.

(Concluded.)

THIRD.—THE SUBJECT.

THIS is Christ. All Scripture is about Him and His coming. The voice of the Old Testament is, "He is coming;' that of the Gospels "He has come;" of the Epistles and Revelation, "He will come again." The Lord Himself says, "Search the Scriptures, for they are they which testify of Me." It is said that in the Swedish language there is no word which can be translated "search," so they have used another word, "ransack," and this is what we need to do, ransack the Scriptures, for "they are they which testify of Christ."

We should begin and continue all study with this thought in mind. As every picture has its "point of sight," so each book in the Bible has Christ as its centre and its object. The disciples thought they knew the Scriptures; but they did not see Jesus in them, for the Lord rebuked them for their failure in this very particular, saying, "O fools and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken. And beginning at Moses and all the prophets, He expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself." Here we have a Bible reading conducted by the Master, on the road to Emmaus, and this was His subject: "Christ in the Old Testament." Again He says: "All things must be fulfilled which are written in the law, and in the prophets, and in the psalms, concerning me." These are the three great divisions of the Old Testament, and we can imagine the great Teacher opening the eyes of His followers and declaring, "In the volume of the book it is written of me." No wonder "their hearts burned within them as He talked with them by the way."

The study of Christ in the Old Testament is exceedingly profitable. In Genesis He is described as the seed of the woman; in Exodus as the "Passover Lamb;" in Leviticus, the high priest; in Numbers, the smitten rock and the uplifted serpent, and in Deuteronomy a prophet like Moses. All of these typify and set forth the person and work of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The Psalms also are full of references to Him. All the prophets, either in type or in prediction, "testified beforehand of His sufferings and the glory that should follow." The Gospels record His life, death, resurrection and ascension; the Acts, the establishment of His Church; the Epistles, the development of His doctrines; and the Apocalypse, the revelation of His coming glory.

The great work of the Holy Spirit is to testify of Christ. "He shall glorify me." "He shall take of mine and show them unto you."

In fact, the whole Bible may be expressed by two words, Christ, Jesus; Christ in the Old Testament, Jesus in the New.

There is a very beautiful hymn in our collection, which we like to hear the children sing, "Every lesson points to Thee":

"While we look within Thy Word,
Show Thy face to us, O Lord,
In these pages may we see
Every lesson points to Thee.

"Symbol, precept, judgment, law,
Melting love and holy awe,
Teach us Lord, whate'er it be,
Every lesson points to Thee."

FOURTH.—THE PURPOSE.

All Scripture was written for us that we might thereby be edified, growing in grace and in the knowledge of the Lord. Paul says "all Scripture is profitable." But some readers doubt the value of the Old Testament; yet the apostle says, "Whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope." The very incidents against which infidelity raises its voice in pro test are the ones which the Lord Jesus Christ sanctoins and presents to us for our admonition and learning. For instance, of the flood He says: "As it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be in the days of the Son of Man." Of her who was turned into a pillar of salt He says: "Remember Lot s wife." The uplifted serpent of brass He has likened to Himself raised on the cross, and with the story of Jonah and the whale He links the great truth of the resurrection. Paul, after giving an outline of events in the history of Israel, says, "All these things happened unto them for examples (or types) and they are written for our admonition." We see, then, that these Old Testament histories have a present value for our souls.

According to Andrew Jukes the types of Genesis are these: Adam, a type of ruin; Abel, one of atonement; Noah, of regeneration; Abraham of faith; Isaac, of sonship; Jacob, of service; Joseph, of glory. The order of these lives forms the outline of Genesis, and corresponds to the development of the new creation within us. Thus, ruin is counteracted by atonement, and regeneration is the result of atonement, after which faith begets sonship, and sonship begets service, while service leads to a life of suffering which will be followed by glory hereafter. The series never changes, nor do its stages come by chance. And as we read this "Book of Beginnings,' let us not consider it a mere history or biography, but remember that "all these things happened unto them for types, and were written for our admonition."

In Exodus is typified redemption by the blood; in Leviticus, sacrifice on the cross and priesthood on the throne; in Numbers and Deuteronomy is recorded our wilderness experience, with its sinnings and repentings; Joshua sets forth Christian warfare, our conflict with "the world, the flesh, and the devil;' Judges describes failure in the land of which Bishop Hall says: "A continued circle of sins, judgments, repentances and deliverances." Does not this describe many of the experiences of God's children?

All other Old Testament books have a present value to us, and are profitable for our instruction in righteousness.

The purpose of the New Testament books is too evident to need comment. We may sum up the purpose of the Gospels with the final words of the fourth evangelist: "These are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through His name." The purpose of the epistles is expressed by the same author, John: "These things write we unto you that your joy may be full,' and "that ye may know that ye have eternal life."

The value of the Revelation is expressed by the same aged seer: "Blessed is he that readeth and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things which are written therein, for the time is at hand." And in proportion as we read and hear and keep, in that ratio will our blessing come.

FIFTH.—THE INTERNAL DIVISIONS.

These are not according to books, chapters or verses, but according to times, seasons, periods, or dispensations. Solomon writes: "There is a time for everything and a purpose for everything under heaven." If we dislocate or "wrest" Scripture from its peculiar time and place, we not only do injustice to God s Word, but we become confused in its interpretation. In order to study and teach intelligently we must "rightly divide the Word of Truth."

There is an old Latin proverb, "Dist ngu te tempora et concordabunt Scripturæ," that is, "Distinguish the periods, and the Scriptures will harmonize." We must see the difference between the dispensation of law and the dispensation of grace; between the earthly blessings in the Old Testament and the spir itual blessings of the New. The Israel of God is one thing, and the Church of God is quite another thing. All Scripture is written to or for the Jew, to or for the Gentile, to or for the Church. (1 Cor. 10: 32.)

We must distinguish between the Lord's coming for His saints and His subsequent appearing with them; between the first resurrection and the second; and between the judgment of believers for rewards and that of unbelievers for punishment. With the great prophetic perspective before us, with the promise that the Holy Ghost "will show us things to come," we can see the future as vividly as the past, and can behold the Son of Man coming in glory as we have seen Him coming in humiliation. Let the student of God s Word locate in each dispensation—past, present and future—such portions of Scripture as belong to it; then will the revealed Word harmonize, instead of appearing sealed, and the word of prophecy will become more sure, "whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place." (1 Peter 1: 19.)

SIXTH.—THE TEACHER.

This is the Holy Ghost (John 14: 26; 1 John 2: 27; 1 Cor. 2: 13). He who wrote the Word is most competent to teach it. The mere acquisition of Scrip tural knowledge does not denote growth in the wisdom of God. We may learn the geography and chronology of the Bible and may have its historical parts on our tongue s end, and yet be wholly ignorant of its underlying spiritual principles. Man may teach much that is on the surface, but only the Holy Ghost can teach the deep hidden things of God. Spurgeon says: "Do not be satisfied with the surface investigation of the Scriptures, but open a shaft and dig deep for its hidden truth." And this the great Teacher will help us to do, for it is His special province "to search all things, yea the deep things of God."

As we begin to explore we find strata below strata. The first is historical. Any one would say the Bible was a history of something. The second is practical and moral; that is, good moral lessons may be adduced from these histories. The third strata is spiritual. This must be reached before we can find salvation for ourselves or teach it to others. Below this is the typical and the dispensational, to which we have before alluded. The Holy Spirit enables us to search these important truths and to digest the strong meat of the Word. Whether we look into these pages for ourselves or for our scholars, let us invoke the aid of the Divine Spirit in its interpretation, and cry out as did the Psalmist, "Open thou mine eyes that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law."

"Holy Ghost with light divine Shine into this heart of mine."

In conclusion—let us, students and teachers, "read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest" these sacred oracles, that every page may become "a lamp unto our feet and a light unto our path." Let us remember that we are handling God s own Word and dealing with immortal souls. And when the truth has been incorporated in our own hearts, then can each teacher say to his class, "Come, ye children, hearken unto me and I will teach you the fear of the Lord.' Remember, too, that this is the only book that will be used in the world to come. In heaven, for the joy and comfort of the redeemed; and in hell, for the judgment and condemnation of the lost. It is a Wonderful Book. It is an Eternal Book. As we look around us we see decay, destruction, ruin and death stamped upon everything. These beautiful flowers will fade, these grasses will wither, this lovely earth which we delight to inhabit will soon "melt with fervent heat" and "the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll,' but the Word of God, as He gave it, will endure forever. Yes, "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but Thy Word, O God, will never pass away."

The Labor Problem.

LABOR, LAND AND LAW. A Search for the Missing Wealth of the Working Poor. By W. A. Philips. Just at this time a discussion of the labor problem is tolerably sure of interested attention, and when the theme is handled, as in this volume, with intelligence, and the conclusions reached are evidently the fruit of patient study and deliberate conviction, they are worthy of careful consideration. The author, W. A. Philips, has been for many years a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Kansas, a circumstance which gives weight to his views, since they are the conclusions not of a cloistered student but of a man of affairs and of one who has had to look at questions from the standpoint of a legislator. He has produced a book of much more than ordinary and ephemeral interest. He sees clearly and presents strongly the evils arising from the growing inequality in the distribution of wealth. He points out the steady growth of an aristocracy through the accumulation of immense fortunes through various forms of speculation, and raises a warning in view of the overshadowing power of corporations, and the increasing tendency toward large holdings of land.

The evils and dangers portrayed are real, threatening, and the present labor difficulties are sufficient evidence that the laborer is coming to perceive more and more closely that he is waging the struggle for subsistence under less and less advantageous circumstances.

We are in full sympathy with the author in his arraignment of wealth, really gotten by robbery and fraud, even though under the forms of law, and recognize, even as he, the injustice and hardship entailed by exacting interest on capital which does not represent value produced by labor, but when he comes to the remedies for these and similar evils, we are constrained to doubt whether they are either desirable or feasible. Carried to their logical conclusion they amount to communism, and while he would not indeed make the holding of property a crime, he yet would by law make its acquirement and inheritance well nigh impossible. In combatting the evils of excessive wealth in non-producing hands, of irresponsible power wielded by corporated monopolies, and of the concentration of the land in the hands of capitalists, he advocates a paternal government and would have it legislate against the monopoly of land, the usurious profits of accumulated capital, and the liberty of disposing of property by will. That law can do something in checking and abating evils may be freely admitted, but there are wider and more pervasive laws regulating society and business than those enacted by national legislatures, and human experience has proven that attempts to override and control these by special legislation have as often intensified as abated the evils.

It is not redistribution by legislation that is the cure for monopolized capital and land, but the immutable law that unenlightened selfish and sinful use of capital will speedily dissipate it, and the slow but sure operation of the principle that the prosperity of the individual is inseparable from that of all.

Despite the arguments of the author, we still believe there is such a thing as the science of political economy, and some of its principles are stronger than the enactments of legislatures. Far the larger part of the volume is taken up with historical sketches of the condition of labor and land among the ancients during the Middle Ages and in modern countries, and the effect of Christianity and Mohametanism. These chapters are among the most interesting and valuable. As a whole the book will repay careful reading, and will contribute to a better understanding, if not to the solution of one of the burning issues of the day. (Charles Scribner's Sons.)

Rutgers College Commencement.

THE GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

THE graduating exercises were held in Kirkpatrick Chapel on Wednesday evening, June 16th. The young orators were greeted by a large and cultured audience, and had the evidence of good attention and hearty applause that their oratorical efforts were enjoyed. The Salutatory was pronounced by Robert Schmitz, taking for his subject "Paul Revere." Irving van Riper spoke on "John B. Gough;" Robert D. Stewart, on "Industrial Education;" Arthur F. Mabon, on "The Persecution of the Jews;" Horace S. Hawes, on "The French Revolution;" Warren S. Mayou, on "Augustus Adolphus;" Alex. Van Wagoner, on "Moral Growth the Standard of National Development;" Ward Righter, on "The Attainment of Knowledge." The valedictorian was Arthur Spaulding, of Spottswood, N. J., whose address was a fitting conclusion to a very creditable exhibition of oratory by bright and hopeful beginners.

The committee on awarding prizes were Messrs. J. R. Russell, Theo. Strong, and W. E. Florence. After due consultation, Mr. Russell reported that the speaking was so uniformly good that the committee found it a delicate duty to make a distinction, but had concluded to award the first prize to Alex. Van Wagoner, of Paterson, N. J., with honorable mention of Arthur Spaulding and S. Ward Righter.

The address to the graduating class by Prof. Austen was in a very felicitous strain, provoked much merriment, and elicited frequent applause; at the same time it had no lack of the best practical truth and excellent counsel.

Prof. Tomlinson, the Head-Master, after a few encouraging words, announced the prizes as follows: For Scholarship, Arthur Spaulding, Spottswood, N. J.; History, Robert Schmitz; Reading, H. Percy Douglas, Tarrytown, N. J.; Spelling, John Carberry, New Brunswick, N. J.; Penmanship, W. Everett Wade, South River, N. J.; Neatest work in Arithmetic Examination, Wm. B. Van Dyck, New Brunswick, N. J.

On the afternoon of the next day (Thursday) the smaller pupils of the Grammar School delighted a sympathetic audience with an interesting programme of song and recitation, vigorously rendered and showing the result of careful training.

THE COLLEGE.

Sunday evening, June 20th, the Commencement exercises proper of the one hundred and sixteenth year of Rutgers College were inaugurated in the Second Reformed Church, with the Baccalaureate Sermon by the Rev. Dr. Wesley R. Davis, of the Madison Avenue Church, of Albany, N. Y. The church was filled to overflowing, many persons being obliged to occupy the aisles. The Faculty of the College, local clergy, and graduating class were seated near the pulpit. With Dr. Davis in the pulpit to assist in the services were President Gates, Dr. Hutton, pastor of the church, ex President Dr. Campbell, Dr. Jacob Chamberlain, the missionary, Dr. McKnight, of the Presbyterian Church and Rev. John Handly, of the Methodist Church. The following is an abstract of the BACCALAUREATE SERMON.

The text was Revelation 5: 9, 10.

"Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof, for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, and hast made us unto our God kings and priests."

The hiding of God's power in the secret places of nature has ever been to thoughtful minds a supreme fascination. Matter is no longer a dull clod, but the centre of forces all important and the tabernacle of strange glories. Ever since Faraday demonstrated that out of one grain of water and four grains of zinc he could obtain electricity equal to a heavy thunderstorm, the word matter has lost its old meanings He avowed the conviction that all known forces may be resolved into some one primal force of which they are the correlative modifications. This is still the dream of the scientist, but that one original power baffles his search. In the Scripture I have just read the primal energy of a spiritual universe is unveiled. "Thou art worthy to take the Book and to open the seals thereof, for thou wast slain." Sacrifice lies at the heart of God's sovereignty. The literal Cross of the Divine Man of Nazareth was the late outward symbol of an earlier, an unseen cross which the Infinite Father had carried from the beginning of the ages. That was the visible offering of a lamb "slain from the foundation of the world." The history of the nation out of which the Redeemer was destined to come was written beside a crimson altar. Sacrifice must save a world which selfishness has ruined—and hence Baron Bunsen has said sacrifice is the fundamental mystery of all religion, whether considered as worship or as life. Christ was the fulfillment of every prophecy that looked from the midst of a bloody ritual toward Golgotha. His presence on earth, His life and passion and death interpret this dim sacrificial instinct of humanity. When the book of man's destiny, in this vision of the apocalypse, lay upon the palm of God—sealed with seven seals—none were found worthy to open it, until He came, who had been slain. He was to uplift and transfigure the future of the race by the power of His sacrifice, and by the law of a love, which born of His Cross was to lay the foundations of His empire in in the souls of men. Christ opens the book of human life by His torn hand. If you would have the seals broken from your clamped and sense-bound immortality you must learn the meaning of that mighty word—sacrifice. No man really opens his highest nature and reads the burning prophecies which the finger of God has written on its pages, until he walks with the King who was crowned with thorns. A crucifixion stands at the head of every great chapter in the record of the world.

Christ seeks to make you "kings and priests unto God." These dignities and duties flower out of His life enshrined in your own. The lofty purpose of God's power is definitely stated in this truth. Kinghood is man's original right. You are summoned to life's struggle with the shadow of a crown on your brow. "The head of every man is Christ." On His head are many crowns. Manhood is complete only as it rises to reign, overcoming evil with good. Your life is to be priestlike—offering yourself as a living sacrifice unto God. Your duty is to live for the strengthening of others; contradicting daily that leer of the devil's lip that all virtue is founded upon self-interest; and proving the fact, luminous even in our age of skepticism and scorn, that man is the Shekinah carrying the light of the knowledge of God's glory in his face.

THE CLASS DAY EXERCISES

were held Monday afternoon in Kirkpatrick Chapel. This performance is especially popular with the ladies, of whom the large audience was for the most part composed. After enlivening music by the orchestra, Charles B. Ludlow, President of the graduating class, indulged in some pleasant remarks, thanking the citizens of New Brunswick, especially the young ladies, for the courtesy and kindness the class had received at their hands. John De Witt, Jr., orator of the day, made an eloquent address. The class poem, by Thos. A. Stoddart, abounded in wit, humor and pathos. George A. Viehman, the historian, pleased the audience with reminiscences, sober and otherwise. Aaron Stillwell, the prophet, foretold the fortunes of his classmates, and caused dismay. The class memorial, a revolving book-case, was presented by Lewis B. Chamberlain in fitting words, and received by President Gates, who responded in a neat speech. The presentation of mementoes by De Witt V. Reiley was a ceremony wittily performed. John M. Farley's address to the undergraduates left them wiser. The ivy oration by E. W. Dewey, and ode by Elmore De Witt, were creditable efforts. The pipe oration by Clarence M. Dubois proved him a youth of a generous nature. The exercises concluded with an address to the President by Peter Stillwell, in which he prophesied a bright future for the College under its present able guidance, which, of course, drew from President Gates a suitable and happy response.

THE CONCERT

was given at the Opera House on Monday evening by the College Glee Club, under the leadership of Prof. Loren Bragdon, assisted by Miss Carrie Hun King, a soprano soloist of rare merit. It was a fine affair.

THE ALUMNI MEETING

was held in Kirkpatrick Chapel Tuesday morning at 10 o'clock, Dr. S. E. Appleton in the chair. The first hour of the session was occupied with the routine business of appointing committees, hearing reports, and choosing officers. The Treasurer reported a balance in the treasury of $113. Rev. J. N. Jansen was elected President for the ensuing year, and Dr. J. G. Van Slyke, of Kingston, N. Y., Orator for 1877.

The next hour was devoted to interesting reminiscences. Prof. Coakley, of the University of New York, who graduated from Rutgers in the class of '36, being invited to the platform, spoke of the progress that had been made in science, art, discovery and invention since his graduation, fifty years ago.

At 12 o'clock the Trustees adjourned from their council hall to the chapel, having just received an addition of two new members—Judge Jonathan Dixon and James Neilson. The portrait of Rev. Dr. Robert P. Lee, a former trustee of the College, was then presented by Edward S. Vail, who, after saying that for twenty five years he had been engaged in rescuing the countenances and having them placed on canvas, of some of the more prominent and influential of the professors and trustees of the College—men who had aided in bringing it to its present high position, and expressing a desire after this presentation to be relieved from further service, added:

We now present you with a portrait of that most excellent and learned man, the Rev. Dr Robert P. Lee, born in 1803. The son of a prominent lawyer of New York city, he early showed some distinguished traits of character. Firm and determined, but excessively modest, he wielded a power and influence in the Dutch Reformed Church hardly equally by any other, and was known in the Synod as "Bishop Lee." While pastor at Montgomery, N. Y., he was the counsellor of the surrounding churches. His decisions were always assented to and universally respected. Possessed of what Locke calls "round about common sense," or a sound and discriminating judgment, he had an almost perfect "rule over his own spirit." Blameless in self-government, his sermons were classic, and his skill and ability in debate were unsurpassed.

Graduating from Dickinson College in 1824, and from our Theological Seminary in 1828, he was elected a trustee of Rutgers College in 1851, and was ever after a devoted friend of the institution. He was one of the ablest and most useful members of the Board. Three of his sons graduated here, and have reflected honor on the name which they bear. Modest, yet fearless, firm and sincere, he was a noble and conscientious gentleman.

This portrait, donated by the family of Dr. Lee, and painted by Mr. Charles W. Jenkins, a well-known artist of New York city, whose skill has aided much to adorn this chapel, is now presented as another token of our regard and affection.

President Gates received the portrait in behalf of the trustees, and in the course of his speech referred to the financial condition of the College, remarking that all the debts of the past year were paid, and for the first time in many years the balance was on the right side of the ledger, which statement was received by the Alumni with great applause.

This was followed by the annual address before the alumni by Prof. Alexander Johnson, of Princeton, N. J., on "The New Political Philosophy," which was marked by close, logical thought.

THE COLLATION.

This was bountiful and toothsome, as usual, and served in the armory at 1 o'clock. At the close of the banquet the Glee Club sang several college songs, when President Gates said it was a pleasant feature of this occasion that the Class of '86 had invited the surviving members of the Class of '36 to be present at the festivities of this Commencement, which marked the fiftieth anniversary of their graduation. By invitation three members of the Class of '36 made addresses—Hon. Joseph P. Bradley, Justice of the U. S. Supreme Court, Cortland Parker and Prof. Coakley. Short and spicy after-dinner speeches were also made by Drs. John De Witt, John B. Thompson, Jacob Chamberlain, Prof. Alex. Johnson and Rev. W. R. Taylor. The company then returned to Kirkpatrick Chapel and listened to the address before the literary societies by the Hon. Charles E. Fitch, LL.D, editor of the Rochester Democrat, on "Journalism as a Profession." The speaker had a broad and deep grasp of his subject, and treated it in an eloquent and masterly manner. In speaking of the perils of journalism he said substantially:

By far the gravest perils come from its real or assumed business interests. The business of journalism is at once the bountiful patron and the severe taskmaster of the profession. There can be no objection to a newspaper making money if it makes it in a straightforward, legitimate way, but the temptations to make it illegitimately are always present and too often persuasive.

The speaker alluded here to that abuse of the freedom of the press, which, regardless of all decency, revels in a flagrant licentiousness, but said that so long as it pays to prostitute the press there will be vile, and wanton, and vengeful sheets, making merchandise of vice, invading the privacy of domestic circles, and assailing the reputation of those who either incur their malice or refuse to purchase their silence. But more subtle than the temptations which provoke the ribald press into being, are those which the reputable press has to meet. What schemes of aggrandisement, what frauds upon the unwary, what humbugs and cheats and delusions invoke the countenance of the press. The wonder is that, in the main, it is so clear-sighted and courageous and inflexible for the right as it is.

The speaker then specified certain other perils against which each individual journalist should guard himself by the restraint of his baser and the quickening of his better nature. These are the perils from self-conceit, from low vices of human nature, from superficiality, from partialities and from lack of convictions. More and more, however, the press is realizing high and yet higher ideals; is cleansing itself from pollution; is taking broader and deeper views of its missions; is eliminating its partialities, its prejudices and its personalities, and is grappling fundamental convictions.

THE JUNIOR EXHIBITION.

Though the storm which commenced about noon increased, so that it rained hard on Tuesday evening, it did not prevent a large attendance at the Opera House to witness the Junior Exhibition. The capacious stage, floor and first gallery were filled to their full seating capacity, and many occupied the second gallery. Prof. Doolittle presided.

The orations were above the average in excellence, and the orators and their themes were: William P. Merrill, New Brunswick, N. J., "The True Idea of Liberty." Thurston W. Challen, New Brunswick, N. J., "The Poet as Prophet and as King." S. DuBois Demarest, New Brunswick, N. J., "The Congo Free State." B. Morss Tremper, Kingston, N. Y., "Gladstone." Asa Wynkoop, Catskill, N. Y., "A Plea for Culture." Frank A. Pattison, Metuchen, N. J., "Arbitration between Labor and Capital." Henry H. Palmer, New Brunswick, N. J., "Grant's Monument." William S. Bishop, East Orange, N. J., "Bismarck and the German Empire." Benediction.

The prize of twenty-five dollars for the best oration was awarded by the judges to Asa Wynkoop, of Catskill, N. Y.

while all were highly complimented for their oratorical success. The charming music by the orchestra between the orations was also greatly enjoyed, and several times applauded.

THE COMMENCEMENT.

The hope generally entertained and often expressed that the storm might cease and Wednesday dawn clear and bright, was doomed to disappointment. It continued to rain steadily all day, and while it did not dampen the ardor of youth it affected the attendance, so that when the exercises began in the Opera House at 10 o'clock A.M., there were many empty seats, but during the early part of the programme the friends of the College continued to come in until a very fair and more encouraging audience greeted the speakers who had the good fortune not to be first on the list.

On the right of President Gates sat Justice Joseph P. Bradley, Prof. Coakley and the Board of Trustees; at his left the members of the Faculty, and on the stage many of the Alumni

The speakers of the Graduating Class and their subjects were: George Edwin Talmage, New Brunswick, N. J., English Salutatory. Elmore DeWitt, Wallkill, N. Y., Philosophical Oration — Memory in Education. Lewis Birge Chamberlain, New Brunswick, N. J., Scientific Oration—Practical Side of Science. Charles Baylis Ludlow, New Brunswick, N. J., The Future of Greece. John Howard Porter, Bordentown, N. J., The Bartholdi Statue. William Hockman, Red Bank, N J., The Indian Question. Clarence M DuBois, Bridgeton, N. J., Alms vs. Self Help Charles S. Cathcart, New Brunswick, N. J., Civilization and Chemistry. John Moyer Farley, Fort Plain, N. Y., The Mohawk Valley People. Aaron Longstreet Stillwell, Somerville, N. J., New Jersey. Joseph B. Reynolds, Bordentown, N. J., Prison Reform. Peter Stillwell, White House, N. J., Our Public Land System. DeWitt Van Dyke Reiley, New Brunswick, N. J , I Am. Henry Judd Ward, Richfield Springs, N. Y., Master's Oration—The College in Human Progress. John DeWitt, Jr., New Brunswick, N. J., Valedictory Addresses.

President Gates conferred the degree of Bachelor of Arts on George Van Nest Baldwin, Lewis Birge Chamberlain, Edward W. Dewey, John DeWitt, Jr., Warren Hardenbergh Dixon, DeWitt Van Dyke Reiley, Charles Baylis Ludlow, Aaron Longstreet Stillwell, Peter Stillwell, Thomas Alfred Stoddart, George Edwin Talmage.

Degree of Bachelor of Science on Charles S. Cathcart, Elmore DeWitt, Clarence M. DuBois, John Moyer Farley, William Hockman, John Howard Porter, Joseph B. Reynolds, Frank W. Ribble, George Anthony Viehman, William H. Waldron.

He then addressed the Graduating Class.

Honorary Degrees.—Bachelor of Arts was conferred upon Rev. John Handley and Jacob J. Janeway, of New Brunswick. Master of Arts on Rev. Frank J. Mundy, of Lynn, Mass. Doctor of Divinity on Rev. Henry Vehslage, of Irvington, N. J. Doctor of Legal Laws on Alexander Johnson, of the College of New Jersey, (Princeton), and William I. Chamberlain, President of Iowa State College. Degree of Civil Engineer on Edson DeWint Eaton. Master of Arts, Gardner Hale Cane, Wilmer McNair, William I Chamberlain, Myron Tracy Scudder, Henry Warren Beebe, George Zabriskie Collier, Frederick Walker Cutler, William H. Steele Demarest, Frederick Parsell Hill, John Lachenheimer, George Mums Lilburn, Harry Mortimer Peters, Jared Waterbury Scudder, Theodore Strong, Henry Judd Ward, Herbert Henry Cameron. Master of Science, Chas. Manning Freeman, Jacob Chester Chamberlain, William Christian Miller, Edson DeWitt Eaton.

President Gates awarded the prizes as follows: General Prizes—Van Vechten Prize for Essay on Foreign Missions, Asa Wynkoop; Van Doren Prize for Essay on Christian Missions, William I. Chamberlain.

Sophomore Prizes—Myron W. Smith Prize for Declamation, 1st, Frank L. Mayham; Myron W. Smith Prize for Declamation, 2d, Sherman G. Pitt; Hart English Literature Prize, Melvin D. Brandow; Spader Prize for Modern History, 1st, Harmon B. Niver; Spader Prize for Modern History, 2d, William J. Lansley.

Freshman Prize—Quick Prize, J. H. Keeling.

The reception in the evening by President Gates was a delightful social event. The residence was handsomely decorated with ferns and flowers, trailing smilax and sweet exotics. Wernig's orchestra furnished exhilarating music. Besides the students, there were present Justice J. P. Bradley, Prof. G. W. Coakley, Admiral Charles Boggs and wife, and many of the best citizens of New Brunswick.

Our Church.

....NYACK, N. Y.—On the 17th inst. the Reformed Church of Nyack celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of the dedication of the original portion of the building in which the church still worships. Services were held in the afternoon and evening, at both of which, the Rev. Dr. W. H. Clark, the last pastor, presided. In the afternoon the main feature of interest was the historical sermon by Rev. Dr. C. S. Hageman, the second pastor. It gave, in a graceful and animated style, the principal facts in the history of the church, and also many illustrative incidents which served to show the development of church life. It was listened to with manifest attention and pleasure from beginning to end.

We have space for only the briefest summary of a very few of the interesting facts presented. The growth of the church is shown by the fact that the building has been enlarged twice—in 1850 and again in 1870—to meet the requirements of an increasing congregatton, and that it is now barely adequate for the accommodation of the peopie. The number of members received to the communion of the church from 1836 to the present is 828, of whom 456 have been received on confession and 372 by certificate from other churches. The losses by death number 147, and if to these are added the losses by removal, the present membership is shown to be 306.

The church has been served by the following pastors, viz., by Rev. Philip M. Brett, 1838 to 1842; Rev. C. S. Hageman, D D . 1842 to 1852; Rev. Benjamin Van Zandt, D D., 1853 to 1856; Rev. Daniel Lord, 1857 to 1860; Rev. Uriah Marvin, 1860 to 1870; Rev. Henry V. Voorhees, 1870 to 1878; Rev. Wm. A. McCorkle, D D., stated supply, 1878 to 1881; and Rev. Wm. H. Clark, D.D., 1881 to 1884. All of the pastors, except the first, are still living, and of the six pastors, from 1842 to the present time, four participated in the exercises of the day. The devotional services of the afternoon were conducted by Rev. Dr. Clark, assisted by Revs. Cornelius Brett, Henry V. Voorhees, J. M. Van Buren, J. L. Zabriskie, and C R. Blauvelt.

The evening was devoted chiefly to brief addresses from former pastors, delivered in the order of their pastorates. Rev. Cornelius Brett of Bergen, a son of the first pastor, gave the first address and he was followed by Revs C. S. Hageman, D D , Benjamin Van Zandt, D.D., Henry V. Voorhees, and Wm. H. Clark, D.D. In the devotional service of the evening Revs. D. M. Talmage, Wm. H. Williamson, and W. C. Stitt participated. Large audiences were present at both services, and much interest was manifested. The church was tastefully decorated with flowers. The music was exceptionally fine, being rendered by the Nyack Choral Society, under the able direction of Prof. G. D. Wilson.

This church, which has now completed its first half century, is vigorous and efficient—never so strong as now—and in excellent condition for more extended work in the future

....BROOKLYN, N. Y.—The Jubilee Service in the Kent Street Church on the 15th, commemorated not only the deliverance of the church property from debt but also the completion of the thirteenth year of the pastorate of the Rev. Lewis Francis. The chief address was delivered by Mr. Francis, from which the following extract is taken:

"They had met there to rejoice over the payment of the debt. The could felicitate themselves on its removal from church and chapel. A debt is not a blessing in the case of either an individual or a church. He prayed that the church would never again have to pay interest, or that the church would ever again have a mortgage placed upon it. The financial history of the church was then outlined. The church, he said, was organized in 1848. In 1849 the first pastor—Mr. Ward—was called. The munificent sum of $300 was paid him by the society, and this was supplemented by $250 from the Board of Domestic Missions. In 1850 the Java Street Church was built. The land on which it was erected was donated by Mrs. M. Meserole. A debt rested on the church until 1864, when it was paid. In 1868, during Rev. Alexander McKelvey's pastorate, the lots on Kent street were bought. In 1869 an effort was made to build a new church, as the Java Street was not large enough to meet the wants of the growing congregation. The members of the consistory and congregation gave liberally to advance the work. In 1870 the church was dedicated. On the day of dedication a large sum of money was raised. The church and land cost in the neighborhood of $60,000. When he (Mr. Francis) came in 1873 the debt on the church was $19,000. Shortly after that, William M. Meserole, on his dying bed, although his will had been made, requested his friends to give $1,500 to the church. This his estate did. In 1878 a determined effort was made to pay off the balance. Messrs. John Englis & Son offered to give $5,000 if the balance was raised. This was done and the debt was cleared. But a chapel was needed. In 1879 the initial effort was made to secure one. The people responded liberally. In 1880 the chapel was consecrated. The structure, independent of the ground, cost $17,000, and a mortgage of $5 000 was put upon it. Last year there came a bequest of $3,000 from one who, during her lifetime had always given liberally to the church, a sister of Wm. M. Meserole and wife of Elder John W. Morrill. This stimulated the consistory to ask the congregation to raise the balance, which was done, and the chapel, like the church, is now free of debt. To him it was a source of great joy that in all calls made upon them all the people had responded liberally. The church had never been a rich one. So the money was raised and mortgage cancelled and we stand to-day free from all encumbrance. He was sure it would interest them to know how much money had been raised in seventeen years. From 1870 to date for congregational purposes there had been raised $188,947.55. For religious and benevolent purposes $11,714 18, making a grand total of $200,661.73, an average of $11,803.63 a year. Now, said Mr. Francis, if you can find in New York or Brooklyn a church of no greater financial ability with a better record than that, I would like to know where it is."

In conclusion, Mr. Francis said he thought he could not do a more fitting thing than to call on all to rise and sing "Praise God from whom all blessings flow." This was sung "with the spirit and with the understanding also."

The Rev. Dr. E P. Ingersoll, of the Church of the Puritans, Congregational, delivered the first congratulatory address. While he was speaking a large artist's proof etching, entitled "At Eventime it Shall be Light," elegantly framed in carved oak, and supported on a handsome easel, was brought upon the platform. Turning to Mr. Francis, Dr. Ingersoll said, "Brother Francis, or perhaps I should call you domine,—the little girl called the word dominoes, and this might not be so far out of the way after all, for you have been a game man. Any man who sticks thirteen years in one place is a game man. You came here with a purpose that reached on through the years. You have worked in the midst of shadows and sunshine. If your life and my life are mingled half and half with them we will be better men and do better work. You are a joyful man and have gone among this people joyfully. You have found even in your severest trials that the clouds have finally lifted. Your people with an abounding love for you present you to-night as an expression of love and esteem, with this picture. Dear brother, this, as you shall look upon it in years to come will be a token to you of the confidence and love of your people. God bless you, and may the years to come be fruitful in blessings upon your head."

Mr. Francis, visibly affected, said that the gift was something undreamt of by him. We came here to rejoice over what we have been permitted to do in freeing our church from debt. In this I feel that I have performed but a small part. I gratefully accept your gift, associated as it is with your love and affection. I shall always prize it. I thank you from a full heart for this lovely expression of your esteem. God bless you.

Short but felicitous addresses were made by the Rev. Thos. H Burch, of the Tabernacle Methodist Church, Rev. Arthur Whitaker, of the Ascension Episcopal Church, Rev. G. W. Folwell, of the Union Avenue Baptist Church, Rev. E A. Hainer, of the Christian Church of the Evangel, Rev. G. L. Aldrich, of the Reformed Episcopal Church, Rev C. E Harris, of the First Methodist Church, and Rev. W. H. Yarrow, of the Orchard Primitive Methodist Church. During the evening a quartette rendered very agreeable music The ladies of the church, at the close of the exercises, served out a bountiful supply of refreshments, and the happy event was prolonged until a late hour for church-goers.

... ALBANY, N. Y.—On Monday evening, June 14th, the Rev. J. P. Davis was installed pastor of the Third Church, a large audience being in attendance. The pulpit was a liberal mass of the choicest flowers, the Madison Avenue Church contributing three of the beautiful designs. Rev. Henry Ward delivered the sermon; Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman presided and read the installation service; Rev. Dr. W. R. Davis charged the pastor, and Rev. Elwin F. See, the people. The church has an excellent choir which opened the services with an appropriate anthem. The new pastor begins his labors under encouraging circumstances.

....CHILDREN'S DAY.—Our exchanges contain pleasing accounts of the observance of Children's Day in our churches at Somerville, Raritan, Paterson, Philadelphia, Stuyvesant, Freehold. Newburgh, Millbrook, Spring Valley, and Cohoes It was observed in many other churches, of which no report has come to our notice.

...BROOKLYN N. Y.—The Rev. J. M. Wagner, pastor of St. Peter's German Evangelical Church, having just resigned his charge, after twenty years of arduous and fruitful service, his people prepared for him and Mrs. Wagner a very agreeable surprise, which was successfully carried out on Monday evening, June 21st. A coach stopped at their residence about 9 o'clock, and they were invited by a committee of gentlemen to enter the conveyance and accompany them to the church. Reaching the church, they were received by the different associations and the officers and teachers of the Sabbath school, and ushered into the chapel, where to their complete surprise they found the congregation assembled. As they entered, the Choral Union sang a song of welcome. Then one after another of the officers of the associations,—the Frauenverein, Jungfrauenverein, the Jurgendverein, the Helping Hand and the Choral Union,—presented to the bewildered pastor ominously ponderous envelopes and floral designs, with neat speeches; and when at last Elder J. J. Schummacher, superintendent of the Sabbath-school, passed into his hands, with warm-hearted words, a precious token of love from the school, the pastor was deeply affected

Recovering himself he thanked them all and assured them of his continued love and affection He said he knew that they loved him and that love for them had compelled him to resign this charge, now too heavy for his enfeebled health, so that a younger and stronger man might successfully carry on this blessed work for the Lord to which he had devoted twenty years of his life and the strength of his manhood. He urged them to keep together in faith, to work together in love, and their hope would surely be realized both here and hereafter.

After the presentations, refreshments were bountifully served in the church parlors by the young ladies It was a happy occasion, and a worthy recognition of the highly esteemed retiring pastor. Few pastors have gained such well-deserved popularity as Rev. Mr. Wagner, not only among the members of his congregation, but among his large circle of friends outside. His work has been arduous, but full of good and lasting results. The Rev. John Guenther, of Newark, N. J., is talked of as his successor.

Mrs. Loring's Discipline.

BY MARY E. BRUSH.

CHAPTER III.

IT was with feelings of relief and gratitude that Mrs. Loring accepted the situation a kind Providence had offered her. She rented her dreary, little brown house to an enterprising young milliner, and then moved her own remnants of furniture over to the large, airy chamber good Mother Bartlett had prepared for her. Mr. Green was an old man, quite unaccustomed to the presence of children, and at first he looked rather askance at little Beth and Ray. There flitted through his bald head dubious thoughts of possible destruction done by certain small fingers to his favorite plants, of jars tipped over and panes of glass broken. But fortunately none of these disasters took place. The little Lorings were obedient children, and when occasionally they visited the greenhouses, it was always with chubby hands clasped behind their backs and a "mustn't touch" expression on their faces. So, gradually the florist's sternness relaxed; he grew fond of the sight of the rosy faces and bright eyes and gleams of sunny curls lighting up the gloomy house, and the sound of cheerful laughter breaking the silence, and by the time New Year's day arrived, bringing its dinner of steaming haggis, which Mother Bartlett served after the approved Scotch fashion, it was Beth and Ray who sat in high honor beside the old man,—a "bonny laddie and lassie," as he called them.

Mr. Green had no cause to regret that he had taken Mrs. Loring into his employment. His business had increased wonderfully since her arrival. People were beginning to find a certain unique beauty in the floral decorations coming from the "greenhouse around the corner." Ruth Loring's slender, white fingers, so unaccustomed to heavy labor, had a deft knack at putting together buds and blossoms. There were always harmonious contrasts and appropriate designs that could not fail of pleasing the most fastidious tastes. And though, perhaps, it was not work of the highest order, such as teaching, painting or writing, she felt that, like every labor which brings one in communion with the Creator of such wondrous things, it was elevating and ennobling. For who could help having holy and happy thoughts when surrounded by beautiful and fragrant blossoms? And with what varied human experiences did she come in contact! There were gay bouquets to arrange for joyous festivals; orange blossoms and blushing roses to deck the bridal and pale lilies for the funeral. Crosses to inspire faith and comfort; anchors for hope; crowns for victory! And as she took an interest in what she did and in those for whom she did it, her own life, which she had thought so barren and dead, grew richer and more complete.

Many times there came to her with striking force the words of the poet, "God moves in a mysterious way!" Had she never stopped in that humble chapel prayer-meeting and so met good Mother Bartlett, she would not have found this comfortable home and the means of making an honest livelihood. Ruth was very thankful.

Time passed on. The winter wore away. Lent, sober-visaged, sombre clad and with lean larder, was at hand. Fashionable people were hurrying to crowd in all possible gaiety. One festal scene trod close on the heels of another.

One morning Mr. Green came in, bringing a large order.

"It is from my oldest and richest customer," he said, "and the most particular one, too! It puts one at one's wits' end to suit her. She usually gives a grand party every winter, and the decorations are expected to be the finest. I always sent Bailey down to see to things. Guess you'll have to go this year, eh?" with a quizzical gleam at her from under his grizzly eyebrows.

"Well, I'll go if you want me to," Ruth composedly replied. Being a well-bred lady herself, she felt no awkwardness in meeting people high in station.

"All right," said Mr. Green, somewhat relieved. "The party is for to-morrow evening. You had better run down there this afternoon and take a survey of the rooms and find out what is wanted. You'll find the old lady fussy, and perhaps you had better pay some deference to her opinions,—it's easier getting along with her. After you find out what is needed you can send word up and I'll send John down to help you and to bring the posies. Let me see,—it's near dinner now. You can finish your work, can't you, and take the half-past two train. On the B. and A. road, you know. It stops at Allandale,—that's the place. Can you get ready, think?"

"If I hurry with these button-hole bouquets,—they're ordered for the charity fair this afternoon. Will you please cut me a few geranium leaves, Mr. Green, and some white carnations?"

Ruth's fingers moved nimbly, but the time was short, and when her task was finished, her dinner eaten and herself clad in travelling gear, scarcely a moment was left for anything save a few hurried directions from the florist and a card, with an address written on it, slipped into her hand. But Ruth was used to this style of sudden exodus. It was not the first time, by a score, that her employer had sent her on similar trips, and the satisfactory results obtained had given her confidence and self-possession.

Allandale was distant nearly an hour's ride. The scenery along the road was commonplace, her fellow passengers uninteresting, and so she determined to make the most of the opportunity offered. She drew from her hand bag the magazine she had slipped in just before leaving. She became so absorbed in one of the Century's "War Articles," that almost before she knew it the train had slackened its speed, the brakeman had opened the door, and, after the pronunciation peculiar to train officials, called out "Allandale!"

Not until she left the car and stood in the archway of the station did she draw from her bag the card Mr. Green had given her and on which he had hastily scribbled the address of the person to whom she was going. The letters were in his large, bold hand: "Miss Isabel Thornton, Woodlawn, Allandale."

Ruth stared, wholly aghast! "Miss Isabel Thornton!" The name of her Guy's aunt! Was it possible that it was she? "Woodlawn,"—that was familiar. She remembered having heard her husband speak of Aunt Isabel owning a place of that name. She had quite forgotten until now, though, that it was in the select suburbs of Allandale. What a predicament! A sense of the ludicrous compelled Ruth to laugh. Then came the annoying question, what should she do? Go back and tell Mr. Green that on account of her own personal grievances she could not perform her duty? He would be greatly disappointed, and not needlessly so, for undoubtedly he would lose one of his best customers. No, Ruth had become too much of a business woman to do that. All that remained for her to do was to go ahead and do her duty to her employer. Probably there was little likelihood of any unpleasant consequences arising. No doubt she would be regarded merely as Mr. Green's assistant. She and Aunt Isabel had never met. Her name even might not be inquired for. If she only kept strong rein on herself so that she did not get nervous, all would go well and her identity remain undiscovered.

Like most women, Ruth had a liking for anything that spiced of the dramatic, and now that she had decided on her course of action, she began to enjoy the anticipation of the interview. Upon inquiry, she found that "Woodlawn" was scarcely a half mile from the depot, and, as the day was fine and the walking good, she chose to go afoot instead of hiring a carriage. The road wound up a hill, down again across a little bridge, and presently she came in sight of dark red chimneys and gray towers framed in the interlaced tracery of leafless trees. It was certainly a stately pile, and Ruth could not help feeling a thrill of the old-time bitterness as she thought of herself toiling for her daily bread and her children deprived of the many things that make childhood a beautiful dream. But it was the thought of these dear little ones that strengthened her nerves, made her bear her head, draped in its widow's weeds, a trifle more proudly, and that steadied the small, neatly-gloved hand that reached out and pulled the bell at the massive front entrance.

Address of President Gates

To the Graduating Class of Rutgers College on Commencement Day, June 23d, 1886.

OUR AGE IS CALLED UNHEROIC.

YOUNG GENTLEMEN: You have sometimes thought the time into which you were born an unheroic age. The Rebellion was crushed before you began to read the newspapers. The high tide of patriotism and moral enthusiasm which marked that struggle had subsided before you began to take an interest in affairs. Questions of honesty in public men and economy in public measures claimed the public attention. Important as they are to good government, such questions do not inspire the young who grow up while they are under discussion, as did the moral issues involved in the struggle about slavery. Great moral principles are not clearly at the front, in the chosen party-issues of the last few years. Indeed, no moral issues divide the two great parties. You remember the half hour you recently spent in the class room, in the vain attempt on the part of those of you who profess either party name, so to formulate the principles of your own party, that class-mates who professed to be of the opposite party would not accept your formula as part of their own creed. Both parties compliment in public that Civil Service Reform which the people have decreed; but in private the politicians of both parties hate and oppose it. And neither party ventures to take decisive ground regarding temperance and the liquor traffic—the gravest question of our time in practical, daily morals. Meanwhile a passionate eagerness in money-getting—such a feverish thirst for quick gains as the world has never before seen, has marked our life as a people during the ten years since you began to prepare for college.

You are to be congratulated that under such circumstances and against such pressure, you have persevered in and have completed that course of liberal study from which too many young men are lured by the prospect of beginning to earn an income while still in their "teens," no matter how lean their whole lives may be from the lack of that education which God once in each life-time and only once gives us youth that we may require!

But while you have been perseveringly fitting yourselves for rich and useful lives by this course of study, at times you have felt that your lot had been cast in one of the quiet, uneventful periods in which enthusiasm seems unfashionable and heroism impossible.

THE LABOR QUESTION CALLS FOR EARNEST THOUGHT AND HEROIC ACTION.

But the events and discussions of the last few months have forever dissipated any such erroneous ideas of the significance and the moral possibilities of our time. Labor, openly, as well as secretly organizing, has met organized capital in the painful and wasteful struggle of strikes and lock-outs. It has sought to coerce individual laborers and employers by personal violence or by the boycott, and the effort has everywhere produced confusion, and has awakened earnest, anxious thought where it has not precipitated actual conflicts. The great battle between right and wrong is not by any means fought out. And you will find, as men at other great crises have found, that when you thought God's battle had been waged in other years, or was raging now in other lands, suddenly the banner is lifted before your very eyes, and the quick, decisive test of conscience and the Gospel, applied to the every-day conditions under which we are living, reveals the old foes under a new face, and calls on every true man to be thoughtful, earnest, heroic in the present!

Do not for a moment understand me to say that in this conflict labor is everywhere in the wrong. Far from it! Sometimes corporations are as greedy as Death, and as unfeeling! There is the greatest need of thoughtful consideration on both sides. "Put yourself in his place," is a maxim which laborer and capitalist must both study to apply in judging each other, and in so shaping their course as to secure their undivided and indivisible interests.

CORPORATIONS AND ORGANIZED LABORERS.

Corporations are here. With all their unlimited power for good or evil, they are with us to stay! The vast enterprises of our nineteenth century civilization demand these huge genii, to perform the stupendous tasks we have undertaken. And since a touch upon its golden lamp has summoned these mighty agencies to the service of Capital, is it strange that Labor, seeing the wonders wrought by organized and united capital, has set before itself the same ideal—combination of effort for a common end? And since Labor has not the golden lamp of Capital, since it has not the laws or the experience ready to its hand, need we be surprised if its first attempts at combination result in the evoking by painful effort of huge "Frankinsteins," gigantic in bulk, Titanic in power, but answering slowly at first to moral suasion, and feeling deeply rather than reasoning correctly?

WORKINGMEN ARE THINKING MEN AND MORAL MEN.

Honest workingmen, the land over, are thinking out these questions. We can trust them, in time to reach the right conclusion. Who would have dared, three months ago, to prophesy as much of progress as we already see on their part toward right conclusions? Our civilization has no more dangerous enemies than the men who persistently confound all desire for reform in the treatment of the masses of our laboring people, with socialism and anarchy? There is a degree of moral thoughtfulness in the shops and factories and in the homes which are supported by them, which most writers have underrated in forecasting our future here in America. Have you ever thought of the moral heroism involved in steadily opposing a strike, when all the men about you, all your equals and companions are clamoring for it? How many men who profess to be on a vastly higher plane, morally, show at times of strain and testing, that moral stamina, that power to hold to convictions against the outcry and the sneers and the threats of all "their set," of which conscientious laboring men are again and again giving evidence in these times of deep feeling and strong excitement?

It is a thoughtful writer and an Englishman who has lately said, "The nobility of human nature is to be found chiefly in the cottage and the workshop." If true in England, with how much greater force does this sentence describe here in America that spirit of steadfast integrity and persistent self denial for the sake of others, which, after all, marks the great mass of our home-supporting wage-workers the country over. I am persuaded from what I already know of you, young gentlemen, that none of you will ever disgrace your Alma Mater by sneering at the workingman, or

> "Forgetting that in holy labor lies
> The scholarship severe of human life."

Even in the midst of these conflicts and convulsions, then, you will maintain a firm conviction that the great mass of our people mean "to do the fair thing," to follow the right course. And you will be thoughtful in devising and active in promoting measures to render clear, in theory and in practice, the true indentity of interest for labor and capital.

MEANING OF "CORPORATIONS HAVE NO SOULS."

Directly in the pathway of any progress toward such a better understanding between corporations and laboring men lies the much-abused phrase, half-legal in its origin, "corporations have no souls." Of course you know that this phrase was simply designed to embody the truth that no man could merge his individual responsibility in corporate action. "Responsibility is and forever must be inseparably connected with individuality," with personality. The principle in jurisprudence which underlies the maxim "corporations have no souls," is that corporations consist, after all, of individuals, each man of whom has a soul, and each man of whom is in honor and in justice bound to bring all the powers of his own individual soul and conscience to bear upon the concerns of the corporations of which he is a member. But in practice, the maxim has worked itself out in so low an average of morality and so lax a sense of moral responsibility in corporate transactions that people too often accept it as meaning "corporations are outside the domain of the whole moral law save what a ledger account embodies; they cannot be expected to act from any higher motives than those of selfishness."

When for a generation, under the influence of the cry "corporations have no souls," men have watched the growth of corporations amassing wealth and engrossing enterprise, shall we wonder that in the heat of conflict with such corporations, laborers in their newly-discovered power of organization are sometimes slow to perceive moral considerations, and less acute than corporation lawyers in recognizing legal rights?

CORPORATIONS MUST BE MADE TO HAVE SOULS.

The truth is, corporations must be made to have souls! The men who compose them—often Christian men—must infuse into their management a higher spirit than that of blind selfishness. If not, corporations misdirected will ruin the social system which they were created to serve. The corporations which represent capital and the organizations which represent labor must voluntarily enter upon relations of sympathetic co-operation.

Formal legislation cannot effect this. Courts of justice cannot bring it about. For two or three generations all the legislative machinery for arbitration has been in existence in France and Belgium, and in Germany and England. But it is inoperative.

VOLUNTARY ARBITRATION.

To voluntary arbitration, undertaken and maintained in good faith and with self-control on both sides, providing the umpire in advance, before the difficulty to be decided has arisen, and involving the constant interchange of views in friendly conferences at which representatives of employers and employed meet each other with mutual confidence and respect—to such voluntary arbitration as this we must look for a solution of the labor problem.

IT HAS SUCCEEDED IN ENGLAND.

And this is no untried theory. Such a system, inaugurated by Mundella in the immense hosiery factories of Northern England, in 1862, has transformed the aspect of the labor question, and has rendered strikes and lock outs unknown. For twenty years and more, the affairs of trades unions numbering tens of thousands of men have been conducted without strikes. Levies and assessments upon the members are never made, and the average cost of this successful machinery to each laboring man who benefits by it is one shilling a year.

"YOU ARE MORALLY BOUND TO BE OF USE IN YOUR DAY AND GENERATION."

Some such reforms as this, you are to see brought about in our own land, young gentlemen. And each one of you is bound to do what he can to promote this better era.

But you are morally bound to be of use in your day and generation. It is for this that we have sought to train you. In describing the condition of lost men in the Inferno, Dante tells us that they know the past history of the world perfectly, and they can foretell its future,—but of the present they are totally and fatally ignorant; so that their knowledge is never of the slightest avail to themselves or to others.

A like heavy curse rests on those college-bred men who, although trained to a knowledge of the past by the study of history, and fond of prophetic forecasts from their love of theorizing, are yet totally ignorant of the life and the needs of their own land and their own time. From this curse, may God deliver you! We expect a strong, manly, helpful interest in the affairs of your own time, from every one of you. As the State College of New Jersey, we recognize the obligation that rests upon us to send out young men who shall take an intelligent interest in the true prosperity of our commonwealth. We look to you to be leaders in right thinking as well as promoters of wise measures looking to her material prosperity.

THE NEED OF OUR TIME IS NOT MERE FORCE, BUT A RIGHT SPIRIT.

There is no lack of money or of material resources, in our land and time. There is no lack of energy or of force in the world. Society is appalled at the huge forces which these last years have evoked, alike in the material and in the social world. The fierce explosions of dynamite and of anarchists; the fusing and far-flashing force of electricity and of combined laborers—here is enough of force! The burning question is, By what spirit shall these forces and this wealth be animated and directed?

More of the spirit of love to God and man is needed in those who lead public opinion and mould public measures. And the well trained and thoughtful young man who addresses himself to sympathetic, helpful work among his fellowmen, in the fear of God, and in the spirit of love, will soon find that he has been endowed with the spirit of power!

It is power, intelligently and firmly to control mere blind forces—it is the spirit of love and of power that the world demands in its true leaders. What shall be the spirit that shall animate these vast social forces of which we have spoken? Shall it be typified by Martin Irons or by Powderly? Shall it be selfish greed on the part of corporations and of operatives? Shall it be mere brute force and violence, or the "spirit of love and power and of a sound mind?"

All the century's material progress does not release you in the slightest degree from the need of a declared personal loyalty to noble ideas, to good faith to God! Professor Ely is not distinctly a moralist. But his recent article upon Socialism and Anarchists contains this significant sentence: "The only real danger which can threaten our country must proceed from private sin and public wrong."

THE SECRET OF THIS RIGHT "SPIRIT OF LOVE AND POWER."

For each one of you, then, the secret of a successful and a useful life is to be found in one way and in that way only. There can be no true brotherhood among men save as men recognize that Fatherhood of God which makes them sons and brothers. The secret of true power, young men, lies in a living union with that Divine Man, that "Strong Son of God, Immortal Love," who is the Source of Power and the King of Glory.

And this King of Glory—mark it well, as you enter on life in a generation called of God to deal justly with laboring men—this King of Glory, as boy and young man received the human side of the preparation for His mighty work while He discharged the humble round of the duties of a carpenter's shop and dwelt in a workingman's home!

The Rupee Christian.

Address of Rev. Jacob Chamberlain, M.D., D.D, before the Particular Synod of New York:

THE Rupee Christian's dime represents more in wages and purchasing power than the American Christians dollar, by perhaps four times. Men work in the harvest field from dawn till night for two-thirds of a dime. We can get the best working woman to work all day long for one-sixth of a dime. It is hardly fair to look in the column of contributions for benevolent purposes, and see that the Arcot Mission only raised so many dollars, and say, "Well, they are lacking in benevolence." There are 1,610 communicants in the native churches of Arcot. They gave last year 1,784 rupees, equal to one-half that number of dollars, over one-half dollar a member.

The total income of the 74 members of one church is $2,920 a year. Their contributions last year were 272 rupees, nearly $150; one twentieth of their entire income for benevolence. Show me a church in our whole denomination in America that gives a hundredth of its income in benevolence. I will go right there and present the mission cause. One widow in that church, with an income of $48 a year, gives $12 a year for benevolence. Our Senior Catechist, who has been supported for twenty three years by the Sabbath-school of the Church in Kinderhook, receives less than $100 a year salary, and his contribution is always one-tenth, often one eighth of his income. He has a family of nine children. Show me in this country a church that comes up to the standard of our churches' benevolence in India.

But it is often asked, Why don't the churches in India become self supporting? Not a man in India becomes a Christian without suffering the loss of all things. Twenty years ago, in the town of Palamanair, a well-to-do merchant heard the Gospel and became a Christian. A mob came to kill him. The carriage in which he and the missionary rode had to be guarded by a body of police. He was baptized, and it was expected that he would be a help to us financially. He had to be taken into the missionary premises to guard his life. He went to his house and had to climb over the scullion gate and go in by the back door; his brothers had built up the front door with masonry. His wife and child went home to her parents; she never would speak to him, and never lived with him again. He tried to get possession of his property, which was in an undivided estate, shared between himself and his brothers. They would not speak to him, but spit upon him and kicked him out. He appealed to the courts, but his brothers, sons of the same father and mother, brought forward forged papers, on old, discolored paper, with faded ink, to prove that he had overdrawn his share of the estate several years before. They also produced notes made to them, and they and other false witnesses swore that they saw him make them. In the court it was believed that this was false testimony, but not a single witness dared testify for him, and the court had to decide that there was no share in the property that he could have.

That merchant lost house and lands and bazaar and wife and child and friends—everything but the suit of clothes he had on, because he embraced the religion of Jesus Christ.

Men of substance have joined us; their substance has not. Now you see why it is that our churches must yet be helped. But give Christianity time to effect the breaking down of caste and opposition, and you will have produced the engineery which shall sweep through India, and carry it all for Christ.

THE UNIVERSITY OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK, at the Commencement, on June 17th, 1886, conferred the following Honorary Degrees: LL.D.—Rev. Thomas Armitage, D.D., City of New York; Austin Abbott, City of New York; William Henry Browne, Washington, D. C. D.D.—Rev. Samuel Henderson Virgin, City of New York; Rev. Robert Cyndylen Jones, Cardiff Wales; Rev. Adolphus F. Schauffler, City of New York. M.D.—Lawson Tait, Birmingham, England. A.M.—Frank Fillmore Vanderveer, City of New York; Edgar Victor Moffat, city of New York; Benjamin Holmes Baylis, city of New York.

Our Book-Shelves.

....“AMIEL'S JOURNAL.” The “Journal Intime” of Henri-Frederic Amiel belongs to the class of books which we call in our own country “Emersonian.” They contain reflections on the spiritual life gained by study of one's own heart, mingled with keen criticisms of books and men. Amiel was for many years a professor at the Academy of Geneva, but his influence on his classes and the outside world was very little. He shrank indeed, as he frankly tells us, from a life of action, he feared the responsibility which attaches to the exertion of power among men. And so he devoted himself to the “little world” within, and left behind him, when he died at the age of sixty, some 17,000 pages of folio manuscript, from which the present book has been selected. The extracts begin with his meditatians in Berlin when he was in his twenty-seventh year, and end in 1881, just before he quitted this life. The translation from the French is excellently done by Mrs. Humphrey Ward, and the introduction by the same hand sums up the general characteristics of the volume very fairly.

The Journal is suggestive and stimulating. It is a record of convictions, hopes, and fear such as sweep over thoughtful souls living in the atmosphere of Christianity and yet subject to the intellectual and social temptations peculiar to the nineteenth century. There is a sadness running like an undertone through it all, as the writer feels a want of capacity for action and his lack of certainty in many conclusions. Yet the thoughts are noble, the criticisms keen and strong, and the definitions often very remarkable. We cannot quote, as space forbids, but a reader of Amiel's Journal must pause on every page. Such books are not of the most healthful class in our training, but they are so rare that they become very valuable. They recall one to his own individuality. They show the importance of the single soul. Though we may not agree with all their conclusions, they educate the reflective powers and make us prize the spiritual above the material. Such a thinker as Henri-Frederic Amiel is but a prose poet, giving to thousands who are voiceless the consolation of knowing that they are not alone in their aspirations, their doubts, and their expectations.

The publishers have done much by paper and print to make the volume very acceptable. (Macmillan & Co.)

....“THE TRANSFIGURATION OF CHRIST.” By Frank W. Gunsaulus. This beautifully printed volume is the work of a thoughtful man of large reading and culture, one familiar with philosophy and anxious to show its accord with the acknowledged meaning of Scripture. There is, therefore, a considerable class of readers to whom it will be very acceptable. But to most persons we fear it would be of small use, owing to its peculiar form and style. To manifest this we quote one sentence from the opening chapter (p. 19): “The consciousness of one's own supernaturalness through the revelation of Christ, in the face of that arrogant and tyrannous naturalism that sin has developed, asserts itself in a new method of self determining life, after the will of Christ: that same consciousness asserts itself in a new view of the universe, in which there lies a unique mental method that makes the supernatural natural, at least to the process and realization of the new intellectual life.” The author makes no attempt to describe the transfiguration or to state in what it consisted, and he falls into the common error of supposing that the three disciples on the Mount entered into the cloud, whereas they stood on the outside, where to them came the voice from the excellent glory which enshrouded Jesus and His two visitors, Moses and Elias. (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.)

....“SCRIPTURES, HEBREW AND CHRISTIAN.” The book before us is Vol. I. of a series by Profs. Bartlett and Peters of the Protestant Episcopal Divinity School, Philadelphia. The design of the series is to present the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments in Scripture language, but condensed and newly arranged as an introduction to the study of the Bible for young readers. The sub-title of this volume is, “Hebrew Story, from Creation to the Exile,” comprising material from the following books of the Old Testament: Genesis, Exodus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, 1 Samuel, 2 Samuel, 1 Kings, 2 Kings, 1 Chronicles, 2 Chronicles, Psalms, Proverbs, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Hosea, Amos, Micah, Nahum, Zephaniah.

The design of the series seems an admirable one; and, so far as we are able to judge from the present volume, its execution equally so.

The language of Scripture is strictly adhered to, and the insertion into the history of appropriate selections from the Psalms, Proverbs and the prophetical books adds interest and vividness to the narrative.

Of the arrangement we should prefer not to speak at this time, simply because it is impossible to speak intelligently without the second volume, to which the treatment of Hebrew laws and customs and certain portions of the historic narrative is deferred. Doubtless the reasons for such an arrangement, which at present seems to us unsatisfactory will then appear, and of their sufficiency we shall be better able to judge. In mechanical execution the publishers have left nothing to be desired. (G. P. Putnam's Sons.)

....“GOTTHOLD'S EMBLEMS; or, Invisible Things Understood by Things that are Made.” By Christian Scriver. Translated by the Rev. Robert Menzies. This book has long been known to English readers by the references to it in all German devotional writers, but strangely enough has never been translated before, although it enjoyed a wide circulation in Germany for more than a century. The present version is made from the twenty-eighth German edition. It is easy and fluent and fairly represents the original. The book is composed of short meditations on the most ordinary objects in nature, a bird in the air, a flower by the wayside, a mote in the eye, a picture, a sun dial, an ant or a bee. From these he deduces a train of pious thought or emotion in a simple and natural way, which arrests attention and ministers to edification. The articles are all brief and can be read in a moment of leisure. Since they are so earnest, Scriptural and sensible, it is no wonder that devout Christians find great enjoyment and profit in them. The book may be very cordially recommended. (F. Y. Crowell & Co.)

....“BARNES' COMPLETE GEOGRAPHY.” By James Monteith. It is difficult to see how completeness in making a geography could further go. Constructed on rational principles, “beginning with known facts which are used as a stepping stone to those which are unknown,” printed on fine paper, in bold, clear type, with numerous and beautiful illustrations which are, in many ways, as instructive as the letterpress itself, it must make the study of geography peculiarly easy and attractive. Its illuminated pictures of the hemispheres and bird's-eye views of the continents and river valleys are an admirable feature of this perfect school-book. (A. S. Barnes & Co.)

....“TRIUMPHANT DEMOCRACY,” by Andrew Carnegie, is a very enthusiastic and highly eulogistic review of “Fifty Years' March of the Republic” of the United States, founded in part on the census of returns of 1830 and 1880. Valuable statistics, carefully verified, are so presented as to be at ractive, impressive and full of force. As he was born in Great Britain and has been for years a citizen of the United States and has proved himself a sagacious business man, Mr. Carnegie is unusually competent to compare, as he does, Great Britain and the United States in relation to Conditions of Life, Occupations and their results, Education, Religion, Pauperism and Crime, Agriculture, Manufactures, Mining, Trade and Commerce, Railways, Literature, Art, Legislation, Foreign Policy, etc. The comparison is fairly made and the result is exceedingly encouraging to all loyal Americans. The style is animated and vigorous. The objection to the book is that the evil and injurious influences which have existed and are still operative in the Republic are almost unnoticed. To this it may be retorted that the author's purpose was to exhibit the progress achieved in spite of the evils inherent in all human society and acknowledged everywhere. We do not know of another volume in which so comprehensive and so circumstantial a comparison is made between the progress of the United States and that of European countries during the present century. (Charles Scribner's Sons.)

Summer Routes and Resorts.

THE Home Journal has been publishing for a few weeks a captivating directory of hotels and boarding houses extending from Old Point Comfort to the northern limit of the coast of Maine and from the ocean to the great lakes. The list is descriptive, condensed of necessity but sufficient of the attractions of the summer homes and the benefits to be derived from them. In fact the attractions are bewildering, but very few will fail to find such a resort as they seek and one suited to the length of the purse. Nowhere else is there to be found a list so varied, so full and so trustworthy.

The West Shore Railroad, E. V. Skinner, Agent, 363 Broadway, corner of Franklin street, send us “Summer Excursions, With Routes and Rates,” and “The Haunts of Rip Van Winkle, or, Rambles among the Catskills,” two handsome pamphlets, furnished with maps and generously illustrated, filled with descriptions of the charming regions within a few hours ride of the city, with full directions of the routes by which they are reached, and with long lists of the hotels and boarding houses of the various localities, with the name and address of each proprietor and the rates by the day or week. Both useful and attractive pamphlets.

A lively and judicious description of our New York wilderness of forest and mountain will be found in “Birch Bark from the Adirondacks,” published by the Adirondack Railway Company, 20 Nassau street, New York. The reader is conducted by a competent and agreeable guide from the city to the mountains and through the chain of lakes and rivers; the hotels, camps, the houses where a meal can be had are pointed out by the way, and all needful information imparted. The little book has also pictures of views and objects of interest, and maps and list of hotels and boarding houses

Periodicals, Serials and Notes.

....Harper's Magazine for July is a seasonable number. Mr. Charles Dudley Warner's relation of his experiences among the summer resorts, told under the pleasing pretence of a novel called “Their Pilgrimage,” is delightful, alike for its close observation and its genial satire. The two other serials—Mr. Roe's “The Home Acre,” and Mr. Blackmore's “Springhaven,”—are also in harmony with the summering and jaunting spirit; likewise “Salmon Fishing,” and W. H. Gibson's exquisite “Singing Wings.” Even the splendidly illustrated article on “The N. Y. Produce Exchange” is not without its suggestion of green fields and meadows and the cattle on a thousand hills. Other articles are two light and graceful stories by the author of “Gemini” and Grace King; “A Night-monkey in the House,” by Olive Thorne Miller; the first of a series of “Social Studies” by Richard T. Ely, on “The Railway Problem,” and the usual Editorial Departments. The illustrations of “She Stoops to Conquer,” are concluded. The frontispiece is a striking portrait of Nathaniel Hawthorne.

....The Atlantic for July opens with Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes's account of his stay in London and Paris fifty years ago. We have seldom read a more interesting description. It will keep every reader's attention and excite a new desire that the “Portfolio” now opened may not soon be closed. The next essay is an uncommonly thoughtful contrast between “French and English,” by Philip Gilbert Hamerton, which is followed by a keen and discriminating paper on “Ouida,” by Harriet Waters Preston. “The Princess Casamassima” becomes tiresome. Mr. James overtaxes the patience of readers by his elaborations. Miss Murfree's story “In the Clouds,” seems nearing its catastrophe. Other articles of more than average power are to be found, while the “Contributors' Club” is especially bright. Altogether we have seldom known a better number.

The Summer Series.

MACMILLAN & CO. add "Dr. Claudius," by F. Marion Crawford, to their Summer Reading Series. One half is written with great power and skill, then the story falls off wonderfully.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co., have published "The Man Who Was Guilty," by Flora Haines Longhead, a well written story, and "The Cruise of the Alabama," by one of the crew, with maps, pictures and notes; a graphic, stirring and instructive description of permanent value, as extensions of the Riverside Paper Series.

Harper's Handy Series is increased by "Pluck" by John Strange Winter, who proves to be a lady. We like Pluck better than the stories by the same author between and "Mignon." Also, by "Her Own Doing," by W. E. Norris, and "Cynic Fortune," by D. Christie Murray, two of the best of comparatively recent English novels, which is, to be sure, faint praise. "The Crack of Doom," by William Minto, and "The Heir of the Ages," by James Payn and "Buried Diamonds," by Sarah Tytler, are the latest numbers of Harper's Franklin Square Library.

Those who would refresh themselves with old English classics will find what they desire in "The Battle of the Books and Other Short Pieces," by Jonathan Swift; "Poems," by George Crabbe; and in "Egypt and Syria," translated from Herodotus. All recent additions to Castell's National Library, and of which everybody claiming to be well read, should know something.

Good Reading.

IT has been a surprise to us that "Miss Tommy," by the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," has been read by so few. Those able to appreciate a thoroughly refined and elevated story, exquisitely told, should take this little book with them into the country this summer. It is almost without what are called "scenes," depends on no conventional situations, and is as far as possible from the sensational, but as a specimen of exquisite, graceful and delicate story telling it has had no superior in the last ten years. The Harpers, we believe, published a cheap and handy edition in paper covers two years or so ago.

How is it too, that so few have read "Vix," a horse story but a love story as well—the love between a horse and a man? If there is a horse story in existence equal to it we have never heard of it. Seldom are genuine wit, humor and pathos so naturally blended in one narrative. It was published, as we remember, by Osgood & Co. as a pamphlet, and sold for ten cents.

Financial.

TUESDAY, June 29th.

THE general condition is one of soundness. The banks are strong, trade is improving—the clearances of last week show an increase of 35 per cent over last year, which is an advance on those of past weeks and they were 20 per cent and over in advance of the corresponding weeks of 1885, failures in business are few in number and nearly all those reported are for small amounts, railroads are passing through the period of reorganization and getting on a better basis, the manufactories generally are busy and fairly supplied with orders, and there is a prospect of an abundant harvest. But the advancing movement is wisely cautious, for the future is uncertain.

The Stock Market has been dull for a few days. It is reported that the sale of securities on foreign account has continued steadily. Buying by the public is moderate and what speculation there is is neither active nor bold Prices have fallen off somewhat, though not seriously. What are regarded as good investment securities are creeping up. For example the new Illinois Central firsts, 4 per cents, are steady at 110 and are held strongly. West Shore 4 per cents have touched 105 and are also sold with increasing reluctance. Union Pacific firsts have reached 119 The payment of the July coupons is at hand, but apart from this these bonds have risen in value. These are cited only as examples of a class. The advance has been slow, but steady. The Norfolk & Western road surprised almost everybody yesterday with a report of an increase of $30,000 in net earnings during May over May of last year; but Reading reported a decrease of over $150 000 in net earnings for May. The cutting on freight rates in the Northwest is serious, and the coal companies in the East are not in harmony.

The Associated Bank last week reported an increase in loans of $3 672,600, in legal tenders of $1.240 800, in deposits of $4 119,400, and a decrease in specie of $1 568 100. The surplus of reserve was reduced $1 357 150, and became $14 354 275 Call loans were made at from 1 1-2 to 3 per cent, and the rates on good commercial paper ranged from 3 1-2 to 5 1-2 per cent. The Treasury continues to gain something on its available balance, and seems to have adopted the policy of redeeming $4 000 000 of bonds a month.

The imports of merchandise at this port last week amounted to $8 255 794 and the exports to $5 709,618. Since Jan 1st imports at this port have been $208 258 112, or $26 000 000 more than to this date last year, and exports $144, 320 242, or $15 000,000 less than last year. The export of specie last week amounted to $1 806,958, and since Jan. 1st has been $38,451,984, or nearly $24, 000 000 in excess of the same part of 1885. One million of dollars in specie were engaged yesterday for export Sterling exchange sold yesterday for $4 88 for 60 day bills and $4.89 1-2 for demand. The export of gold just now is to Germany and probably represents the sale here of American securities. Within a few days silver has been lower than ever, and the bullion value of the silver dollar at present is about 75 cents.

In England wheat is lower, corn steady in price, in France wheat and flour are steady. The stock of wheat in Europe is less than it usually has been at this season. The shipments from India will fall off for a few months. The visible supply of wheat here was reported yesterday reduced by a million and a half of bushels. It is 29 483 665 against 37,947 624 bushels at this time last year, and St. Paul and Minneapolis were not included in the reckoning last year. Quotations yesterday for July delivery were: Wheat here 84 1-8, in Chicago 72 3-4; corn here 46, in Chicago 34 3-4; oats here 33 1-2, in Chicago 27 1-8. The quotations for cotton closed at: July 9.32–33. Aug. 9.40–41, Sept. 9.27–28, Oct 9 14, Nov. 9 9–10. Choice timothy hay is worth 80 to 85 cents, clover mixed 55 to 65; No. 1 rye straw 80 to 85, oat 35 to 40, wheat 25 to 35. The supply of rye straw continues moderate. The hay crop in this region, with good weather for harvesting, will be large.

AUNT MARJORIE'S CORNER

Children and Poetry.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

BEARING in mind the distinction between poetry about childhood and poetry written for children's pleasure, we shall readily see that the latter has a field of its own, yielding to no other in beauty and importance. That the best children's verse is enjoyed by grown people, while many children delight in the lyric poetry of Scott, the stirring ballads of Browning, and the flowing melody of Longfellow, argues nothing against the fact that the little ones ought to have poetry of their very own as a part of their mental diet; of their daily bread. And let nobody fancy that the production of this verse is easy, a matter of reeling off a certain number of lines by the yard, with a jingle here or there. To the making of simple, sweet poetry for the nursery, there must go sympathy with the child-nature, a divine capacity for putting yourself in the child's place; there must be esprit, dainty fancy, imagination, culture.

To illustrate what I mean let me quote a little conceit by Robert Louis Stevenson in that charming chaplet, entitled "A Child's Garden of Verses."

"I have a little shadow that goes in and out with me,
And what can be the use of him is more than I can see;
He is very, very like me from the heels up to the head,
And I see him jump before me when I jump into my bed.

"The funniest thing about him is the way he likes to grow—
Not at all like proper children, which is always very slow;
For he sometimes shoots up taller, like an India-rubber ball,
And sometimes gets so little that there's none of him at all.

"One morning very early before the sun was up,
I rose and found the shining dew in every buttercup;
But my lazy little shadow, like an arrant sleepy-head,
Had stayed at home behind me, and was fast asleep in bed."

Let us try, in cold blood, to make something sweet and graceful to match that happy thought of our poet. It looks easy—it is easy reading, but to write it is almost as difficult as to write a fragment of an epic.

Indeed, like Sunday-school oratory, for which one man in a thousand has a positive genius, while the other nine hundred and ninety-nine are solemn prigs or dreary bores attempting a role which is beyond them, the writing of stories or poetry for children is a talent by itself. Charles Kingsley had it, as is witnessed by "Water Babies," that most delightfully entertaining of books, in which occurs this never-surpassed pathetic bit. A fairy sang it to Tom; do you remember?

"I once had a sweet little doll, dears,
The prettiest doll in the world,
Her cheeks were so red and so white, dears,
And her hair was so charmingly curled.
But I lost my poor little doll, dears,
As I played in the heath one day;
And I cried for her more than a week, dears,
But I never could find where she lay.

"I found my poor little doll, dears,
As I played in the heath one day;
Folks say she is terribly changed, dears,
For her paint is all washed away.
And her arm trodden off by the cows, dears,
And her hair not the least bit curled;
Yet for old sake's sake she is still, dears,
The prettiest doll in the world."

To think that the pen which wrote "Hypatia" should also have written this! It proves how versatile and many-sided is genius.

Here is a pretty thing by Elizabeth Stuart Phelps. Perhaps you have heard it, but if the boy at your side has not he will thank you for reading it to him, or he would, if I had space to quote it all, but unfortunately I can only put in a thumb and pull out a plum, since it is too long for entire reproduction here. Franko, a darling child of three or four years, is at play in the garden with Pharaoh,

"The finest dog you'll see,
If you search from Maine to Georgia,
For a dog of kingly air
And the tolerant high-bred patience
The great St. Bernards' wear,
And the sense of lofty courtesy
In breathing common air."

Hidden behind a screen of lilies, the unsuspected observer tries a little experiment.

"I called the child's name, 'Franko!'
Hands up to shield my eyes
From the jealous roses, 'Franko!'
A burst of bright surprise
Transfixed the little fellow
With wide bewildered eyes."

Puzzled, he peers into the bushes, looks up at the sky, across the lawn.

"Who spoke," cried Franko, "tell!"

Puzzled, he strikes upon a solution at last.

"Grave wrinkles on his eyebrows,
Hand upon his knee,
Head bared for close reflection,
Lighted curls blown free,
The child's soul to the brute's soul
Goes out earnestly.

"From the child's eyes to the brute's eyes,
And earnestly and slow,
The child's young voice falls on my ear,
'Did you speak, Pharaoh?'
The bright thought growing on him,
'Did you speak, Pharaoh?'"

Among the favorite recollections of my earliest days are the striking an attitude, while perched upon a footstool I repeated with great appreciation:

"I will go to my tent and lie down in despair,
I will paint me with black and will sever my hair,
I will sit on the shore when the hurricane blows,
And reveal to the God of the tempest my woes!"

This lamentation, supposed to be uttered by an Indian chief after the extermination by pale faces of all his kith and kin, and the destruction by the flames of his wigwam, was not child's poetry, but it deeply impressed the childish mind. On the same shelf in the mental pantry, now dried and faded, but perfumed still, I find that I have kept a flower culled from the pages of the old English Reader.

"How fair is the rose, just washed in a shower,
Which Mary to Anna conveyed!"

There are fairer roses, yet I still like that one.

I suppose the child does not live who has not had reason to detest good old Dr. Watts for his immortal advice:

"Let dogs delight to bark and bite,
For 'tis their nature to;
Let bears and lions growl and fight,
For God hath made them so.

"But children you should never let Your angry passions rise," etc.

An equally opprobrious rhyme from the point of view of a chidden child, was one which parents used to bring forth to point an obvious moral.

"How proud we are! how fond to show
Our clothes and call them rich and new,
When the poor sheep and silk-worm wore
That very clothing long before!"

A volume of Original Rhymes by Ann and Jane Taylor, was once possessed by every well-regulated family. It was the pioneer which made ready the path for the most of bright books which the fortunate children of to day find ready for their pleasant hours. With these and Mother Goose the child of the last generation was, however, in no danger of ennui, the graver poetic element being supplied by hymns which every well-brought-up child was not only expected but compelled to learn by heart.

Rejoicing as every thoughtful person must, that the mothers of the period do not impose as their grandmothers did, passages of Scripture and hymns to be memorized as penalties for naughty behavior, I cannot but regret that the fashion of learning poetry has passed away. Time was that every girl's mind was enriched with treasures of English verse, laid up where moth and rust would not corrupt nor thieves break through and steal. For what we learn when the memory is most receptive is not to be lightly taken away from us.

I think the child is defrauded of its just rights who is not properly fed upon Mother Goose and her melodies, in which there abides so imperishable a flavor of attic salt under the delightful nonsense.

How many a time when some reckless impulsiveness has landed us in a "scrape" have not you and I recalled the legend of "The man in our town

Who was so wondrous wise,
He jumped into a bramble bush
And scratched out both his eyes.
And when he found his eyes were out,
With all his might and main
He jumped into another bush
And scratched them in again."

The ability to perform this latter feat with success being, dear friends, the secret of victory instead of defeat in many a conflict in this troublesome world. How fascinating the little picture in

"Rock-a-by baby, thy cradle is green,
Father's a nobleman, mother's a queen,
Johnny's a piper, and pipes for the king,
Betty's a lady, and wears a gold ring."

How delicate the pathos in the stanza in which

"As Betsey Brooks and Tommy Snooks
Were walking out on Sunday,
Said Betsey Brooks to Tommy Snooks,
'To-morrow will be Monday.'"

Alas, yes! Monday with its whistle at seven, its factory bell still earlier, its rub-a-dub-dub, its scrub, its toil, its care! How terribly the hard hand of Monday presses on the great world of labor. And that reminds me of a rarely beautiful touch in the Revised Version, "There remaineth, therefore, a Sabbath rest to the people of God!" The thought is full of the sweetest peace.

To dismiss dear Mother Goose and her procession, Little Bo-Peep, Simple Simon, Mother Hubbard, and the dear old playtimes and favorites in a few lines would not be fair, if I had not the hope that you who read would indulge your fancy and the children's by another peep into the bright old pages.

Among verse of a high order with which children are readily charmed, let me mention "The Pied Piper of Hamelin," which I have read to little folk time and again, always to their enchantment. "The Cataract of Lodore" is another prime favorite, and Oliver Wendell Holmes' rhymed "Story of the Revolution," told by a grandmother to a set of delighted youngsters, is equally potential in its charm. Macaulay's lyric, "How Horatius Kept the Bridge," Mrs. Browning's "Rhyme of the Duchess May," Campbell's "Hohenlinden," Browning's "How They Brought the Good News from Ghent to Aix," Read's "Sheridan's Ride," is each in its turn sure of a place in the love and memory of an intelligent child. Time has failed me to mention Scott, but the boy who has not heard "Marmion" and "The Lady of the Lake" till he knows many a ringing passage by heart, has been wofully neglected. As for the fatuous indifference which for daily reading gives boys and girls only the stuff turned out mechanically by a half dozen popular writers, who shall be nameless, to the neglect of Scott and Shakespeare, it is difficult to characterize it as it deserves.

The best writers do not clog on the palate, nor do they destroy the appetite for whatever is good, find it where you may.

The intelligent child referred to will appreciate Jessie McDermott's poem in Harper's Young People:

O sixty years ago to a day,
Three maidens lived—so the grandmothers say—
In a farmhouse under an old elm tree,
And they were as busy as maids could be,
And as fair as busy—the grandmothers say—
O sixty years ago to a day.

For Molly could spin and Dolly could bake,
And Polly had all the butter to make,
And never an idle moment had they
To spend with the village girls at play;
For Molly must spin and Dolly must bake,
And Polly had all the butter to make.

Those were good old times—so the grandmothers say—
O sixty years ago to a day,
When bread was baked in the proper way,
And butter was sweet as new-mown hay,
And yarn was yarn—so the grandmothers say—
O sixty years ago to a day.

Now who were these maidens so clever and quick,
Who never were idle, or naughty, or sick,
Who were busy and healthy and handsome and gay,
O sixty years ago to a day?

I think you will not have to go very far
Before you find who these maidens are:
Your grandmother's one, and my grandmother's one,
And in fact every grandmother under the sun
Was one of the Mollys or Dollys or Pollys,
Who did such wonderful things they say,
O sixty years ago to a day.

Whilst not agreeing wholly with the dictates of those who sternly cut off every moral as ruinous to art, I put in a plea for nonsense, pure and unadulterated. It is good for children. There ought not to be a pill hidden in every sugar-plum. It would be better for us all if we oftener gave the reins to fancy, were gay with the babies, and threw our sober, plodding moods overboard for a time.

Pardon the repetition that what we learn earliest we longest retain, but in the interest of the possible dark days of maturity or old age, the childish mind should be stored with beautiful thoughts wedded to beautiful words. While it is easy to acquire, and while memory, like a trusted warder, keeps faithfully every impression, we should give the children treasures which will gain in value with every passing year. In times of illness, of languor, of sorrow, perhaps of physical blindness or deafness, the hymns and songs, repeated over and over in childhood, will come back on white wings with tuneful melody.

Prized on their own account they will become very precious through the associations clustering around them. They were recited to mother, and mother is in heaven. They were part of the home in which we had neither cares nor burdens, and the light that never was on land nor sea hovers over them and clothes them as with the very peace of God.

...."WOOD, HAY AND STUBBLE," by Kate W. Hamilton, is a book for young ladies which, perhaps, it would be difficult to praise too highly. One who begins to read it will be sure to finish it, and one who has read it can scarcely fail to be the better for having done so. It especially enforces the value of clear convictions of duty and contrasts a decided Christian life with a shallow and meaningless profession. We commend it to the attention of Bible-class teachers. While We May.

THE hands are such dear hands;
They are so full; they turn at our demands
So often; they reach out,
With trifles scarcely thought about,
So many times; they do
So many things for me, for you—
If their fond wills mistake,
We may well bend, not break.

They are such fond, frail lips
That speak to us. Pray, if love strips
Them of discretion many times,
Or if they speak too slow or quick, such crimes
We may pass by; for we may see
Days not far off when those small words may be Held not as slow, or quick, or out of place, but dear,
Because the lips are no more here.

They are such dear familiar feet that go
Along the path with ours—feet fast or slow,
And trying to keep pace—if they mistake
Or tread upon some flower that we would take
Upon our breast, or bruise some reed,
Or crush poor Hope until it bleed,
We may be mute,
Not turning quickly to impute
Grave fault; for they and we
Have such a little way to go—can be Together such a little while along the way.
We will be patient while we may.

So many little faults we find.
We see them; for not blind
Is Love. We see them; but if you and I
Perhaps remember them some by-and-by,
They will not be
Faults then—grave faults—to you and me,
But just odd ways—mistakes, or even less—
Remembrances to bless.
Days change so many things—yes, hours,
We see so differently in suns and showers.
Mistaken words to-night
May be so cherished by to-morrow's light.
We may be patient; for we know
There's such a little way to go. —N. Y. Observer.

A Stowaway.

BY O. A. BIERSTADT.

A GREAT ocean steamship had left Liverpool and was making its way down St. George's Channel. It was bound for America, and its passenger list including the names of Mrs. Morton and Miss Stella Morton. As the weather was pleasant and the waves did not run very high, most of the ladies aboard had no fear of sea-sickness and remained on deck, walking back and forth, or reclining easily in their steamer chairs.

"So, mamma, we are going home again?" asked Stella Morton, who was a bright and curly-haired girl of twelve.

"Yes, Stella," answered Mrs. Morton, "we are on the water again, and I hope nine or ten days will see us safe at home in New York with your dear papa."

"I think the ocean is just lovely," said Stella, "but I'll be awfully glad to see papa once more. Why did we ever leave him and come such a long way over the water? I don't understand it. A hundred times before I have asked you the same question, and you always put me off for an answer."

"Well, I will tell you at last what our errand has been," replied her mother. "You should have known long ago, only I wanted to surprise you by introducing a new cousin to you; but now it seems that is not to be. Perhaps you may remember hearing your father sometimes talk about his brother in England. This brother died several months ago and left an only son, a motherless boy, but a few years older than you are, Stella. Your father was very anxious to adopt this boy, and being tied fast to his business, so that he could not get away, he let us come over to England to try and look up your cousin."

"And couldn't you find him, mamma?" asked Stella.

"No, dear," responded Mrs. Morton. "Down in Surrey, where he used to live, they could only tell me that he had gone up to London soon after his father's death. And in London, why—to look for a boy in such a great city as London, is a thousand times worse than looking for a needle in a haystack. So I had to give him up."

"Oh, dear! what a pity!" exclaimed Stella, and she thought of her undiscovered cousin, until her attention was absorbed by a flock of sea-gulls screaming over something to eat in the water.

The next day the steamer touched at Queenstown and then struck out into the broad Atlantic. Stella and her mother watched the land drop out of sight far astern, and afterwards they walked briskly to and fro on deck. Soon curiosity moved them to join a crowd of the passengers, who had gone forward on the hurricane deck to the wheel-house and were looking down upon the lower deck devoted to the steerage and the crew.

"What can the matter be?" asked Stella of the doctor, an amiable young Englishman with gold lace on his cap and sleeves.

"O, nothing, only a stowaway," was the medical man's reply.

"And what is that, please?" questioned inquisitive Stella.

"You see that country boy down there," said the doctor, "the one the sailors and stokers are making game of. Well, he is a stowaway; came aboard without a ticket, or any money to pay his passage."

"I see him, mother," exclaimed Stella; "the boy in a corduroy suit, with his cap over his eyes and a great big comforter around his neck. But, doctor, why did they let him come, if he couldn't buy a ticket?"

"He didn't stop to ask anybody's permission," answered the doctor. "Sneaked aboard unseen, and stowed himself away out of sight below, like a rat in his hole. But he is caught in a trap now."

"He looks pretty pale," said Stella, "and I do believe he's almost ready to cry. What will they do with him?'

"He is pale," asserted the doctor, "because he hasn't got his sea legs on yet, and he'll cry fast enough before he sees land again. Perhaps he ought to be strung up to the yard-arm or dropped overboard for the sharks to gobble up, but I suppose they will put him to work in the fire room, as they do all stowaways."

Stella did not waste many more thoughts on the poor boy until the next morning, when her compassion was much more strongly excited. She was taking a turn alone on deck after breakfast, and happening to look down upon the lower deck again, she saw something that made her hasten there at once. It was the young stowaway, with the doctor bending anxiously over him and a crowd of steerage passengers standing around them in a ring. The poor fellow was lying flat on his back and appeared to have fainted away. His eyes were closed; a cold sweat was breaking out on him, and his face was turning ghastly pale under its thick coating of coal dust. His hair, face, and clothes were so begrimed with this black dust, that Stella thought he looked as if he had been driving a coal cart for a good many years without ever stopping to take a bath. The doctor was rubbing the patient's head with a piece of ice and occasionally paused to feel his pulse.

"Oh! doctor, can I do anything to help you?" exclaimed Stella, as soon as she had pushed her way through the curious crowd.

"No, Miss," answered the doctor, "there is nothing more to be done, thank you. The boy is coming out all right, but he is not a very strong one. You see, they set him to work shoveling coal under the boilers, and the heat, the motion, and the hard work prostrated him. He is likely to have a hard time of it before he gets through, and he will wish he had staid at home."

Just then the suffering boy's eyes opened, cast one imploring glance at Stella, and rolled up so as to show the whites in a most alarming manner. Stella had never before seen such a distressed look. It touched her so that she burst into tears and ran away to her cabin to hide her head in her mother's lap and sob as if her heart were breaking. Afterwards she told her mother about the boy, and a way suggested itself to her in which she might help him. It was to pay his passage for him. Mrs. Morton contributed the first few dollars, and then Stella went to all the cabin passengers and begged money for a poor young stowaway. On the ocean, people have more time and inclination to be charitable than on land, so this kind, good girl, took up a large collection—enough to buy a ticket for the boy and give him some money to start with in the New World besides. It may well be believed that the stowaway was very glad to be relieved of working his way across the Atlantic. The most adventurous boy, with his head full of yarns about the sea, would soon get enough of a stoker's life, and Sinbad the Sailor would never have made a second voyage, if he had had during his first to shovel coal into a hot fire to keep up steam.

The young stowaway was brought into the cabin to thank his benefactors, and Mrs. Morton asked him how he happened to be going to America under such circumstances.

"It came about this way, ma'am," said the boy. "My home in Old England used to be down in Surrey. But my father died a while ago and left me all alone in the world, except for some relatives away off in America. There wasn't any money or work for me around home, so up I walked to London. I found work enough there, to be sure, and it seemed as if boys were of some use to somebody. Several places I tried and did what was to be done in them well enough, but the pay was next to nothing. I couldn't earn my shoe leather, much less my board. So I was almost ready to give up and jump into the Thames. Then I got the idea of going over to my American relatives. I spent my last ha'penny in getting to Liverpool. There I could think of nothing better than to stow myself away on this ship. I was nearly starved when they pulled me out of my hiding-place and set me to work. Oh! that horrible work! it almost killed me. When I think of it, I can never thank you enough, ma'am, for your goodness."

"What is your name, my boy?" asked Mrs. Morton.

"Albert Morton," answered the lad.

"Is it possible?" exclaimed Mrs. Morton. "Stella, this young stowaway is your cousin. So we are going to take him home with us after all."

The Magic of Silence.

YOU have often heard "It takes two to make a quarrel." Do you believe it? I'll tell you how one of my little friends managed. Dolly never came to see Marjorie without a quarrel. Marjorie tried to speak gently, but no matter how hard she tried, Dolly finally made her so angry that she would soon speak sharp words too.

"Oh, what shall I do?" cried poor little Marjorie.

"Suppose you try this plan," said her mamma. "The next time Dolly comes in, seat yourself in front of the fire and take the tongs in your hand. Whenever a sharp word comes from Dolly, gently snap the tongs, without speaking a word."

Soon afterward in marched Dolly to see her little friend.

It was not a quarter of an hour before Dolly's temper was ruffled and her voice was raised, and as usual she began to find fault and scold. Marjorie flew to the hearth and seized the tongs, snapping them gently.

More angry words from Dolly.

Snap went the tongs.

More still. Snap.

"Why don't you speak," screamed Dolly in a fury.

Snap went the tongs.

"Speak!" said she.

As snap was the only answer, Dolly cried out, "I'll never, never come again, never!"

Away she went. Did she keep her promise? No, indeed! She came the next day, but seeing Marjorie run for the tongs, she solemnly said if she would only let them alone they would quarrel no more for over and ever.—Ex.

A Fourth of July Story for Boys.

BY GERTRUDE L. VANDERBILT.

"IT was all Buonaparte's fault that Tom didn't have a pleasant Fourth of July last year! All the boys said so. It was too bad, Tom's such a nice fellow! If Buonaparte only hadn't—If Tom only had—!"

The fact is, I am beginning to tell the story just as the boys began to tell it to me, and perhaps you are just as much mystified as I was. "What had the Emperor of the French to do with Tom's Fourth of July! Who is Tom? Why didn't he have a good time?"

I don't wonder you ask these questions, for that's just what I asked Charley, "What had Napoleon Buonaparte to do with your brother Tom?"

So having finally got a more lucid account of all that happened, I will tell you the story, and perhaps you will learn from it how foolish it is for boys to be careless, (for Tom was careless.) That, you see, is the moral of the story, and instead of putting it at the end I have put it at the beginning. So boys, just remember that, you must not be careless,—that is my text.

Tom and Charley had been given two puppies by a man who worked on their father's farm. As the man was a Frenchman, he had named one of the puppies Napoleon, and the other Buonaparte. Of course the little dogs did not retain these long names for many months. Think of calling Napoleon, Napoleon, Napoleon, every time you wanted to feed the little creature! Time is too short to spend in such a wasteful way. The dogs soon got to be Nappy and Bony! Nap died in early puppyhood, but Bony grew up to be the most intelligent, frisky, funny little fellow you ever saw. He was not a dog with a pedigree, only just a little mongrel cur, but it was astonishing how much he knew. He would play with the boys as if he was a boy himself. Tom said he understood everything you told him. He had even tried him in French by saying to him from his sister's French exercises, "Comment vous portez vous?" But Bony only cocked up one ear, (a way he had,) and looked at Tom without uttering a sound, as much as to say, "Well, that is beyond me!" Tom's pronunciation may have been at fault. Charley said that Bony knew well enough, but didn't want to be thought a Frenchman, he being an American dog. Bony! What a name to call such a plump, round, well-fed puppy!

But that has nothing to with the story, and I dare say that you want to know what Bony did that interfered with the boy's fun on last Fourth of July; for, as he enjoyed a frolic just as much as they did, it was certainly very unusual for him to be the cause of stopping any amusement. I will tell you what happened.

Tom and Charley had been saving money to buy firecrackers. They kept the money in a box under the rafters in the barn, and almost daily they counted it over. I have forgotten how much they told me they had.

I, myself, have the feeling that if they had been very thoughtful boys they might have given a little of this money to the cause of Foreign or Domestic Missions in the Sunday-school. The domine talked enough about it, and the mite boxes stood right before their eyes. Not that I blame the boys for wanting firecrackers, or for saving money to buy them, but they might have given at least a small share of their savings to the Lord. But you see Tom was such a careless boy that he never thought of it. Boys, remember my text—don't be careless!

One Sunday, about ten days before the Fourth, the boys went as usual to Sunday-school in the morning, and after that to church. Many of the congregation were farmers who came from a distance in their wagons; for this happened in a small town in western New York. All the farmers there keep dogs, happy dogs that go about without muzzles, quite unlike the poor dogs in and near large cities with leather straps or wire cages over their poor noses. It was not unusual for these dogs to follow the wagons to church and to sleep under the sheds where the wagons were standing during service.

They were generally quiet, well-behaved dogs, acting as if responsible for the dignity of their respective owners. Once in a while some one of these sensible creatures even followed his master into the church, sleeping in the aisle at the pew door with his nose on his front paws, never stirring nor even snapping at the flies that buzzed over his head, as if aware of the decorum required by the occasion.

At one time Bony had effected an entrance in the church in view of this privilege being entended to his acquaintances; but his behavior had not been such as to warrant his appearing the second time. Tom's father being in the consistory and one of the domine's personal friends, it would have been very much out of place to have his dog set a bad example by trying to get up a frolic with the elderly and well-behaved dogs who knew how to deport themselves in church!

It was for this reason that Tom had been bidden to chain up Bony every Sunday morning, on peril of having the dog killed or given away. These dreadful alternatives had so impressed Tom that his father's orders had been strictly obeyed—until on this occasion. Whether it was that his mind was so occupied thinking of the Fourth of July, or that it was Tom's nature to grow forgetful, I cannot say, but Tom did not chain Bony that day, and, missing the boys after a time, he traced them to church and went in to find them. They sat in the back of the pew, and grandpa near the pew door. Had grandpa's sight been good he might have seen Bony in the aisle, but he did not, and Bony, in imitation of the good shepherd dog at another pew door, pretended to stretch himself out and go to sleep But you might as well expect a boy full of fun and frolic to keep still, as to expect Bony to behave like the old shepherd dog near him.

In the pew in front of the boys sat the family of Farmer Jones. Several small children filling the pew, the farmer was in the habit of putting down his hat on the floor in the aisle. On this Sunday it happened to be a straw hat. It proved to be an irresistible attraction to fun-loving Bony. He had at all times most destructive propensities. Whenever he found a shoe he was sure to carry it off into the barnyard. Feather dusters, whisk brooms, towels, or aprons were never safe if left on the kitchen floor. A feather fan he delighted in, and, held between his naughty paws, he would tear feather from feather in a little while, and then toss the fragments up in the air as if he enjoyed the havoc he could make.

Bony seemed to feel that that hat had been placed before him purposely for his entertainment. Farmer Jones, this being a warm day, and feeling tired in the middle of harvest time, had fallen asleep. Being in the side aisle, Bony was screened from being seen either by elders, deacons, or the domine, and the old-fashioned, high pew doors screened him effectually from the observation of others, so that Bony had an uninterrupted hour over the hat. He ended with leaving it in fragments at the pew door.

You may imagine the surprise and dismay of the owner when, after the benediction, he stooped down to get his hat. He found only a litter of straw, broken and frayed bits of the rim, and a tattered and torn piece of a crown.

What the farmer said was mild reproach compared to the anger that flashed from the elder's eye on seeing the consequence of Tom's disobedience, as Tom meekly picked up the fragments of what had once been a hat, Bony looking on and wagging his tail unconscious of the disgrace he had occasioned.

Tom's father lent the farmer a hat to wear home. A few days after he rode to the next large town, a distance of some twelve miles, and returned with a nice band-box and a new straw hat in it. Tom and the hired man were sent in the buggy-wagon to give the new hat to Farmer Jones.

The money that paid for the hat was that which the boys had saved for firecrackers. That was the reason why Tom had no firecrackers, and that is why they did not have a good time last Fourth of July.

The Report on the Revised Version.

IN regard to the report of the Committee of the General Synod the following communication has been received:

MY DEAR DR. FERRIS: The statements in the report of the Committee on the Revised Version in regard to the Convention of Canterbury; the unadjusted differences between the English and the American companies, and the object for the continued organization of the latter, were based upon two articles of Dr. Schaff in The Independent on "The Present State of the Revised Version." As Dr. Schaff was one of the Revisers, these articles led us to suppose that the Revised Version might possibly be to some extent revised.

Ordination of Mr. William I. Chamberlain.

THE Classis of New Brunswick met in special session on the afternoon of Sunday, the 20th, in Kirkpatrick Chapel of Rutgers College, to ordain the candidate, William I. Chamberlain, as a missionary to India. Rev. James Lefevre, President of Classis, presided and read the form. The sermon was preached by the venerable Rev. Wm. H. Campbell, D.D., who 27 years before had preached the sermon at the ordination of Mr. Chamberlain's father as a missionary to India. His text was Mark 16: 15, "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." The charge to the young missionary was, by request of Classis, given by Rev. Jacob Chamberlain, D.D., of the Classis of Arcot, India, the father of the candidate. The ordaining prayer was by Rev. Dr. Hutton, Mr. Chamberlain's pastor. The other portions of the service were participated in by Rev. Drs. Corwin of Millstone, Mabon, [of the Theological Seminary, Cooper, of Rutgers College, W. R Davis, of Albany, Willis, of Hertzog Hall, and others. Twenty ministers joined in the laying on of hands, including the pastors of the Presbyterian and Methodist Churches of New Brunswick and the professors in the Theological Seminary. The benediction was pronounced by the newly ordained missionary. This is the first ordination ever held in the present College chapel. The chapel was thoroughly filled and the services throughout were exceedingly impressive.

ON June 18th, 1886, Elizabeth, wife of Frederick C. Markle, died at their residence within the bounds of the congregation of the Reformed Church of North Marbletown, N. Y., in the 91st year of her age. Her husband is still in the enjoyment of good health at the age of 92 This aged couple have lived an exceptionally happy life together as husband and wife. They were married almost 67 years ago. Both of them united with the old Marbletown Reformed Church nearly 61 years ago, on the 25th of July, 1825. Few have been more faithful in attendance upon Sabbath services than they. It was a delightful sight to behold this aged couple drive up to the church, having ridden a long distance over rough roads. But only one remains now to continue these visits to the sanctuary, and he is only waiting for his Lord to call him to that home whither the partner of his life has gone. W. H. S.

BUTTER.—Receipts for the week, 52,857 pks.; exports 3,368 pks.

Receipts from all quarters continue heavy and shipments very light. N. Y. State butter is being largely held back, except the regular weekly shipments from creameries, and Western butter has mostly supplied the market. Among the sales for export were about 2,000 pks. of middling grades of Western butter for German account at 8a10c., and say 1,200 tubs of finest creamery for Great Britain at 15a 6c. To home trade the demand was chiefly for finest N. Y. State creameries at 17a18c., Western creameries at 16a16½c., and fine dairy makes at 15a 16c., but most sales this week were for speculative account, and stock went into cold storage for later markets. Market closes with very large stock in cold storage, more goods of all kinds offering, and prices easier. We quote:

Fancy creamery	@17½
do dairy (selections)	15½@16
Good to fine	13 @15
Poor to common	7 @12½

CHEESE.—Receipts for the week, 64,936 boxes; exports 58,536 boxes.

The market weakened on Monday but showed signs of a good fight on Tuesday, and rallied sharply and routed the bears handsomely on the last half the week. A fraction over 7½c. was finally made for specials, but at the close 7½c. was considered the quotable top. Night milk skims were quick taken at 5a6c., and the market closes with clean floors, cool weather and prices firm. We quote:

Factory, white, full cream, finest	@ 7½
" colored, " "	@ 7½
" good to fine "	6½@ 7¼
" skims	1 @ 5

EGGS.—Receipts for the week were 14,412 bbls.

There was an advance of fully 1c. per doz. on the week's business. Fine near-by marks are taken on arrival at full prices, also best marks of Canada and Western. Sales on 'Change to-day 10 bbls. Canada firsts at 14c. We quote:

Near-by marks, fresh eggs	@15
Western and Canada	13½@14

INDIGESTION, DYSPEPSIA, nervous prostration, and all forms of general debility relieved by taking Mensman's Peptonized Beef Tonic, the only preparation of beef containing its entire nutritious properties. It is not a mere stimulant like the extracts of beef, but contains blood-making, force-generating, and life-sustaining properties; is invaluable in all enfeebled conditions, whether the result of exhaustion, nervous prostration, over work, or acute disease; particularly when resulting from pulmonary complaints. Caswell, Hazard & Co., Proprietors, New York. Sold by druggists.

The "Old Reliable" Carpet Sweeper.

The celebrated Bissell Carpet Sweeper Co., of Grand Rapids, Mich., is making sweepers that, in our opinion, for utility, hygiene and economy cannot be equalled. They will sweep up almost anything, from every particle of dust to the annoying threads, pins, etc. A broom moves the dust, which is drawn into the lungs with every breath, from place to place, while these sweepers confine it, thus avoiding injury to health and the trouble of dusting. Carpets swept with these reliable sweepers will last from one to two years longer than where a broom is used, and, being light running, can be easily handled by a delicate woman or young child. They are sold in all parts of the country and at Eastern office, 103 Chambers street, N. Y. We are confident that a single trial of these now famous sweepers would readily remove the strong prejudice against carpet sweepers existing in many minds through an acquaintance only with the ordinary sweepers, which generally prove worthless.

NATURE'S CURE FOR CONSTIPATION,

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT

Sick-Headache, AND DYSPEPSIA.

This well-known substitute for the old-fashioned drastic cathartics was manufactured in 1884 for the use of the Physicians of the Metropolis. It rapidly supplanted the violent purgatives then in vogue, and is now prescribed by Physicians and recommended by Druggists everywhere. In small doses it is an efficient antidote for Nausea, Sick Headache and Sea Sickness. In larger doses it tones the stomach and gently operates upon the bowels, neutralizing the ill effects of indiscretions in eating or drinking. Its neat portable form, its inexpensiveness and its prompt action render TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT an indispensable an addition to the Household Medicine Chest, as it is to the Traveller's Outfit. Sold by druggists everywhere.

AYER'S PILLS. Sugar-Coated Cathartic

If the Liver becomes torpid, if the bowels are constipated, or if the stomach fails to perform its functions properly, use Ayer's Pills. They are invaluable.

For some years I was a victim to Liver Complaint, in consequence of which I suffered from General Debility and Indigestion. A few boxes of Ayer's Pills restored me to perfect health.—W. T. Brightney, Henderson, W. Va.

For years I have relied more upon Ayer's Pills than anything else, to my bowels. These Pills are mild in action, and do their work thoroughly. I have used them with good effect, in cases of Rheumatism, Kidney Trouble, and Dyspepsia.—G. F. Miller, Attleborough, Mass.

Regulate

Ayer's Pills cured me of Stomach and Liver troubles, from which I had suffered for years. I consider them the best pills made, and would not be without them.—Morris Gates, Downsville, N. Y.

I was attacked with Bilious Fever, which was followed by Jaundice, and was so dangerously ill that my friends despaired of my recovery. I commenced taking Ayer's Pills, and soon regained my customary strength and vigor.—John C Pattison, Lowell, Nebraska.

Last spring I suffered greatly from a troublesome humor on my side. In spite of every effort to cure this eruption, it increased until the flesh became entirely raw. I was troubled, at the same time, with Indigestion, and distressing pains in

The Bowels.

By the advice of a friend I began taking Ayer's Pills. In a short time I was free from pain, my food digested properly, the sores on my body commenced healing, and, in less than one month, I was cured.—Samuel D. White, Atlanta, Ga.

I have long used Ayer's Pills, in my family, and believe them to be the best pills made.—S. C. Darden, Darden, Miss.

My wife and little girl were taken with Dysentery a few days ago, and I at once began giving them small doses of Ayer's Pills, thinking I would call a doctor if the disease became any worse. In a short time the bloody discharges stopped, all pain went away, and health was restored.—Theodore Esling, Richmond, Va.

THE greatest things in quiet places grow:
And men are like the trees, which need the light
And free fresh air to make them strong for life.
The noblest deeds in silence are thought out;
And plans are born while only stars look on,
And hopes are whispered to the birds and flowers
Which keep the secret. So the grand oaks grow
That once were acorns: so the grand deeds, too,
That once were only dreams.

A little village in Northamptonshire
Became the home, a hundred years ago,
Of a young man, poor and unlearned at first,
Whose thoughts were clarion-calls he needs must hear
And dared not disobey. He read the news
How India, with its costly merchandise,
Its wondrous wealth, and vast extent of land
Did now belong to England. And he read
How Agni, Soma, and a host of gods
Were worshipped by the Indians, and his heart
Was filled with longing to go forth, and tell
The good news of the love of Jesus Christ,
And the glad heaven which He has made the home
For all the peoples of the Father's world.

Great need had he of patience. No one cared
To listen to the visionary talk
Of him they deemed fanatic. So he took
The little village church they offered him,
And when the stipend, ten or fifteen pounds,
Proved all too meagre, made the village shoes,
And mended them; and taught the village boys,
Making a globe of leather for his school,
And giving lessons in geography—
Chiefly of India. But the Moulton fields
Were his prayer-places, and the silent trees
Looked down the while he made his high resolves,
And the calm stars smiled with approving light,
And now and then the wakeful nightingale
Might hear another plaintive lay than hers
Break through the stillness, and "O Lord, how long?"
Come from the lips of Carey.

Much he tried
To get the ear of others. At all meeting times,
When ministers together came for talk,
He was among them, and in earnest words
Pleaded the duty of the modern Church
To care for India. "God has given the land
To us," he cried, "and we must win it back
To Christ. Oh, brothers, why still hesitate?
Let us go forward, and attempt great things
For God, and then expect great things from God
Who will not disappoint us." Angrily
An older man cried out, "Sit down, young man."
Yet was not Carey silenced.

Many days
Passed on before he had his heart's desire;—
And then, behold, in far off Serampore
The man of Moulton! Honored, learned, praised,
Professor in the college; translator
Of the most Holy Book he loved so well,
Leader of modern missions, whose good name
Was spoken in our English parliaments
And in the homes of India; so he lived:
And, like a tree whose leaves for healing grew,
In stately strength and beauty reared his head,
Because his great true heart was brave for God.

Churches, Not Missions.

OF all the religious efforts in cities, of all plans for relieving the woe which poverty and sin bring upon the people, the best is the establishment of churches. With many people the idea of the mission is simply a sort of house of refuge, or a spiritual poorhouse, and the way in which it is conducted does not belie that conception of it. Wealthy churches attempt to discharge their obligations by establishing missions into which the rich and great may go to extend a hand once or twice a week, thence back to their own circles. Such work is little better than nothing. The need, above all else, is the planting of regular churches, which should be encouraged and helped to ecclesiastical and financial independence as rapidly as possible.

Most of our missions in large cities are so conducted as to be perpetual nurseries. Persons in good social position will not join them, holding themselves above them, and the poor understand very quickly the drift of things. Years ago Mr. Moody said to a little boy in this city, "Why don't you come to my mission?" He replied with evident pride, though belonging to a poor family, "Why, I belong to the cathedral." That is it exactly. So long as the church is kept dependent upon some rich neighbor for its officers and financial aid, so long will it be a baby. To have the communion administered by the pastor of a patron church, or to have its officials in some other membership, is bad and should never be continued a day beyond necessity. Let us put strong men as pastors in these missions; help the enterprise to self-support; let each have its own communion table, its own boards of deacons and trustees and its own Sunday-school. Make the pastor responsible by putting the responsibility upon him. Then he will gradually draw about him persons of such social standing and financial ability as will insure the success of the work.

Let us not be misunderstood. Where self-support is impossible for a church, then, of course, it must be helped, but its coming to efficiency and power depend largely on the kind of a man that is at its head. A weak minister will not do for our city missions. Said Garfield, "With a log in the woods, with Mark Hopkins at one end and a student at the other, you will have a college." A church is often dependent on one man. Given a strong, efficient minister of the Gospel, and if he can be held in his place he will have a church. Nor would we crowd a church to self-support beyond its ability to become such, but many of these churches learn by the things they suffer. The young eagle in its nest, as long as it is fed and fattened, remains there happy enough; but it cannot fly. The old bird starves it awhile until it becomes thin and light, then taking it to the edge of the nest, gently pushes it off. Of course it thinks it is to be killed. It screams, and with beak and claw clings to the edge of the old nest. Just when it thinks its brains are to be dashed out, a parent wing is thrust under it to break its fall; thus it learns to fly a little. Next time it will do better, and after a while it is a free, strong bird. It is so with young doves and pigeons. Feed them, fatten them and you will always have a squab. When you want a bird with a swift wing, thrust it off, and it learns to fly. So only will it learn to be what God intends it should be.

Let us recognize the old plan a poor one. We have pursued it at Boston to the jeopardy of our denominational work. We have not as many churches in that city to day as we had twenty-five years ago, and not as many as the Unitarians have now. The method that we urge involves a larger outlay at first but would be in every way more economical. Men competent to found and build up churches must be fitly salaried. For a time it will be the application of the old principle of an army of stags with a lion for a leader, but the investment never fails to justify itself until the church comes to stand alone, an independent and aggressive agency.—The Advance.

International Sunday-School Lesson.

BY REV. JOHN C. VAN DEVENTER.

July 11th.—"Jesus the Good Shepherd."—John 10: 1-18.

Golden Text.—"I am the Good Shepherd; the Good Shepherd giveth his life for the sheep."—JOHN 10: 11

CENTRAL TRUTH.—"The LORD is my Shepherd, I shall not want."—PS. 23: 1.

INTRODUCTION.

THIS discourse may be connected either with the preceding narrative, or with the latter part of the chapter, which recounts what transpired at the Feast of Dedication. The manner in which the LORD begins His discourse seems to warrant the former view. Jesus had just been revealing Himself more fully to the blind man as the Son of God, and had also uttered a word of rebuke to the Pharisees who stood near. In this parable, or rather in the two parables which compose our lesson, He still further sets their unworthiness before them in contrast with Himself.

THE LESSON.

I. I AM THE DOOR.—VS. 1-9.

V. 1.—"Verily, verily, I say unto you." These words indicate the importance of the teaching that follows. In order to understand the parable we need to anticipate the explicit declaration, "I am the door," and to remember that spiritual teachers like the Pharisee were recognized as shepherds in the Old Testament. "He that cometh not by the door into the sheepfold." The door of the fold is under the dominion of the owner of the sheep. He appoints the porter to guard the entrance. No one can enter without the consent of the porter or owner, and this consent will not be granted to unworthy persons. These Pharisees were in the fold. They sat in Moses' seat, yet they were faithless and untrustworthy, and were making a prey of the sheep. They did not recognize the ownership of Jesus, and would not yield themselves to His authority. They had climbed up some other way, and were thieves and robbers, enriching themselves while impoverishing the sheep.

V. 2.—"He that entereth by the door is the shepherd of the sheep." He comes to the entrance without any dissimulation. He knows that he has a right to enter because in the service of the owner. He may be a hireling, yet, until his character shall be revealed by danger, he is accredited with due authority as a shepherd. In all this section the shepherds spoken of are the under shepherds or human pastors of the flock.

V. 3.—"To him the porter openeth." His relation to the flock and to the master is thus fully recognized, and he is given free access to the sheep. The Church, through its regularly constituted authorities, examines the credentials of all who claim to be shepherds, and none can properly exercise these functions without such formal opening of the door by the porter. "The sheep hear his voice." They also recognize his authority over them. They have learned to depend upon his guidance and protection. "He calleth his own sheep by name" These sheep committed to his care are in a sense his own. He has become familiar with them and endeared to them. "And leadeth them out." His work is to feed the flock.

V. 4.—"He goeth before them." The shepherd is a leader and not a driver. Going before them he indicates the way, guards from the approach of danger and gives confidence to the sheep, who "follow him, for they know his voice."

V. 5.—"A stranger will they not follow." The sheep are shy and suspicious of strangers. They are unwilling to obey any but their own leader. It takes time for a new shepherd to win their confidence so that they will follow him. Teachers and pastors must gain this confidence before they can expect to lead the sheep committed to them.

V. 6.—"They understood not what things they were which he spake unto them." The rebuke intended was so delicately conveyed under the figures of this parable that the dull hearts of His auditors had not recognized its meaning or application.

V. 7.—Jesus proceeds now to make His meaning more plain, and its application more direct. "I am the door of the sheep." This statement has a twofold meaning. He is the door by which the sheep enter the fold. We become His sheep only by faith in Him. He is the door that closes the sheep in, while it shuts danger out.

V. 8.—"All that ever came before me are thieves and robbers" This cannot mean that all teachers who had preceded Him in time had been imposters, for He recognized the authority of the Old Testament prophets, but we must understand the word "before" just as we do in the First Commandment, as indicating opposition or rivalry. All who claim to take Christ's place are imposters and dangerous. "The sheep did not hear them." Those who did hear them proved thereby that they were not sheep.

V. 9.—"I am the door: by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved,....and find pasture" Those who come to Jesus find the door open for them to enter His fold, where protection and shelter, guidance and provision await them.

II. I AM THE GOOD SHEPHERD.—VS. 10-18.

V. 10.—This verse is really the transition from the idea of the door to that of the Chief Shepherd. He thinks of those who had climbed up some other way, and of the depredations they had made in the flock, and contrasts with their malice His own loving care. From this point on He magnifies His position as the Chief Shepherd, whose especial work in behalf of the sheep no human pastor can do. "I am come that they might have life" He came to give life, not to take it; to feed the sheep, not to be fed by them. "And that they might have it more abundantly." A vigorous life full of blessedness is what He gives to His sheep.

V. 11.—"I am the good shepherd." Not merely the good in contrast with the bad, but the chief,—the true shepherd,—the owner of the sheep. "The good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep." When David was a shepherd lad he ventured his life for his sheep in the conflict with the lion and bear, so Jesus put Himself in the place of peril that He might save His flock.

V. 12.—"He that is a hireling." The hireling may be faithful in ordinary circumstances. He may see that his interests are wrapped up in the welfare of the flock under his care, but the hour of danger tests the measure of his devotion. "He seeth the wolf coming, and leaveth the sheep, and fleeth." This is not intended so much as a rebuke for the hireling, as a contrast which should show the superior interest of the true shepherd.

V. 13.—"The hireling fleeth, because he is a hireling" Nothing more or better could be expected of one, "whose own the sheep are not." If our salvation depended upon the faithfulness of servants it must have failed.

V. 14.—"I am the good shepherd and know my sheep" This knowledge is more than recognition or intimate acquaintance. It implies the closest fellowship,—a union of interest, so that the shepherd looks upon the flock as a part of himself. "And am known of mine" This interest is mutual. As Jesus identifies Himself with His people, so must we identify ourselves with Him. As He gave Himself up heartily for our service, so should we present our bodies, a living sacrifice, unto Him.

V. 15.—"As the Father knoweth me, even so know I the Father." As this clause stands separated from the preceding verse it seems irrelevant, but when it is closely connected with it, as in the Revision, it throws a flood of light on the statement just made by Jesus. Jesus thus compares His knowledge of the sheep, and theirs of Him, with the mutual knowledge and fellowship existing between His Father and Himself. Language could not be found to express more strongly His identification with those whom He came to save. "I lay down my life for the sheep."

The peril which demanded this sacrifice was not a sudden and unexpected emergency. Jesus knew that if He would save others, Himself He could not save.

V 16.—"Other sheep I have that are not of this fold." The Jewish fold was too narrow to accommodate all the ransomed flock. This Good Shepherd was to go by His Spirit through the world calling His sheep by name, and leading them into green pastures and by waters of rest, until the blessed consummation when "there shall be flock (not fold) and one shepherd."

V 17.—"Therefore doth the Father love me, because I lay down my life." This sacrifice of Jesus was not the cause of the Father's love for Him as His Son, but it was the ground of an especial complacency in Him as His servant in accomplishing redemption. "That I might take it again." This complacency of the Father was seen in the fact of the resurrection. Because the death of Jesus had been pleasing to God, therefore He rose in triumph from the grave to receive the promised reward and to enter into His kingdom.

V. 18.—"No man taketh it from me." The death of Christ on the Cross seemed to be the result of the combination of His enemies and the treachery of Judas, but He anticipates the end and here emphatically declares that His death for the sheep will be His own voluntary act. "I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again." Who could thus speak, but the Author of all life? "This commandment have I received of my Father." He came to do this work, not in independence of His Father, but in obedience to His command. Redemption was planned in the councils of the Godhead, and Jesus took upon Himself our sins with the full consent of the Father.

LESSONS FOR TO-DAY.

1. "No man cometh unto the Father but by me."
2. "He that is of God heareth the words of God."
3. God will never cause His people to go where He does not lead.
4. "He that hath the Son hath life."
5. He loved me and gave Himself for me.
6. There are many folds but only one flock.
7. Christ's gift of His life for us was voluntary and complete.
8. We should gladly live for Him who died for us.

Carl's Rose.

"I will be as the dew unto Israel; he shall grow as the lily."—HOS. 14:5.

I REMEMBER reading of a little German boy named Carl, whose father gave him a plot of garden ground in which were many tender plants needing constant care and attention. The little fellow was very proud of his garden, and never failed to water the plants at sundown, so that they always looked fresh and strong, no matter how hot the days might be. After some time, however, he had a sudden invitation to go to a relative's house many miles off, for a few days, and in the excitement of his going he forgot to leave instructions about his garden. He remembered, when it was too late, that he had not spoken to anyone about his pretty flowers, and he greatly feared that on his return he would find them all dead.

His first thought on reaching home again was for his flowers. He fled to the garden, and the tears started to his eyes as he saw the beautiful plants lying withered and almost dead, where but a few days before they had been so fine. His pretty garden was but a wilderness, parched and desolate.

In the midst of the desolation, however, one little rose stood erect and strong, as though it had been watered by some secret fountain, and its grateful perfume seemed to express its thanks.

Surprised and pleased, Carl knelt down to discover the secret of the rose. Lo! a dew-drop had rolled into its very heart, and become there a fountain of refreshment and strength in the hottest days.

Carl grew up to be a man, and in his journeyings through the weary world he was often reminded of his little rose, and its secret source of strength. Many flowers in the great garden life through which he passed seemed parched and withered; many he had seen bright enough in the morning of their lives seemed to him to grow faint and weary before half the day was done, whilst others, like his rose, held up their heads during the most trying times, and breathed a thankful spirit always. Pondering what such things could mean in the garden of human souls, he knelt, as in the days of his childhood, to discover the secret source of strength, when, lo! God's promise was revealed to him, as it is in our text: "I will be as the dew unto Israel."

The gardeners are busy everywhere, tending the delicate flowers that need protection from the parching heat, as well as from the nipping frosts; and in God's garden everywhere He would have the precious souls of His dear little ones sheltered beneath His shadow. Into every heart willing to receive it He pours the dew of His blessing. But even very little hearts may be closed against His love. We may think ourselves strong enough and happy enough without the love of God in our hearts, but we will soon find, when the heat of temptation comes, that our "goodness is as a morning cloud, and as the early dew it goeth away."

How wonderful must God's love to sinners be, to cause Him to send such messages to them as we find in the Bible? They have but to turn and believe in Him. Withered and stained with sin their souls may be, yet His gracious promise is: "I will heal their backsliding, I will love them freely; for mine anger is turned away from him. I will be as the dew unto Israel; he shall grow as the lily, and cast forth his roots as Lebanon... They that dwell under his shadow shall return; they shall revive as the corn, and grow as the vine: the scent thereof shall be as the vine of Lebanon."—Sunday at Home.

A Child's Christianity.

LITTLE Mabel's mother had long been dead, and while her papa was away from home she had no companions but her governess and the servants.

Her father had often told her not to admit to the house any person with whom she was not acquainted.

One cold wintry day a poor, ill-dressed woman stopped at the door and asked permission to warm herself by the kitchen fire.

"But," said Mabel, "my papa doesn't know you."

The woman was shivering with cold, and the rain and sleet dropped from her thin wraps.

A bright idea soon entered the child's head.

"Say," said she, "do you know Jesus?"

Tears started to the poor woman's eyes, and she began to tell how kind the Saviour had been to her.

"Well," said the child, "if you know Jesus, you may come in, for papa knows Him, and I'm sure he won't care."

Thus should the manifestation of a knowledge of the Redeemer's love for him be the countersign by which we are to know all true Christians.—Early Dew.

What Are Christians For?

A CHRISTIAN lady, who was engaged in work for the poor degraded, was once spoken to by one who was well acquainted with both the worker and those whom she sought to reach, and remonstrated with for going among such a class of people.

"It does seem wonderful to me that you can do such work," her friend said. "You sit beside people, and talk with them in a way that I do not think you would do if you knew all about them, just what they are, and from what places they come."

Her answer was, "Well, I suppose they are dreadful people; but if the Lord Jesus were now on earth, are they not the very sort of people that He would strive to reach? And am I any better than my Master? Would He feel Himself too good to go among them?"

A poor, illiterate person, who stood listening to this conversation, said with great earnestness and simplicity, "Why, I always thought that was what Christians were for."

The objector was silenced, and what wonder? Is not that what Christians are for? If not, then what in the name of all that is good, are they for?—American Messenger.

Business and Religion.

A WEALTHY, irreligious, shrewd business man in Illinois was approached by a member of the Church of Christ for a subscription towards building a meeting-house. He cheerfully put down his name for two hundred dollars, and then remarked, "I give that as a good business investment I would rather give two hundred dollars every year than not to have the Gospel preached in this community."

"How is that?" he was asked. "You do not pay any heed to the Gospel. Why are you interested in having it preached?" "O," he replied, "I live here with my family, and my property is around here; without the influence of Christianity the condition of society would soon become such that neither property nor life would be safe. I would not be willing to live in any community where the Gospel was not preached!"

These views of a hard headed man of the world are confirmed by all experience. Christianity is the salt of the earth. Only the utterly abandoned would be content to live where its influence had ceased to be felt.—The Presbyterian.

AN OLD BELL.—Many people have copies of Millet's Angelus in their homes, and will be interested in a very quaint story that is told of a bell of St. Regis, Canada, which has rung the Angelus one hundred and eighty two years. The Indians of that locality became papists. Their French priest sent to France for a bell, and it was shipped for Montreal. In the Bay of Fundy—the place of remarkable tides—an English man-of war seized the bell, and it was carried to Salem, the city of witch memories. The people of Deerfield very much wanted a bell to ring at sunrise and high noon, as well as Sundays, and they took possession of the bell, and it made music for a while in that old town. But the keen priest of St. Regis traced it, and speedily planned a secret midwinter expedition, and marched into Deerfield and actually recaptured it; and for nearly two hundred years the successive generations of St. Regis have bowed and crossed themselves as it has daily rung the Angelus.—The Congregationalist.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Combines, in a manner peculiar to itself, the best blood-purifying and strengthening remedies of the vegetable kingdom. You will find this wonderful remedy effective where other medicines have failed. Try it now. It will purify your blood, regulate the digestion, and give new life and vigor to the entire body.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla did me great good. I was tired out from overwork, and it toned me up." MRS. G. E. SIMMONS, Cohoes, N. Y.

"I suffered three years from blood poison. I took Hood's Sarsaparilla and think I am cured." MRS. M. J. DAVIS, Brockport, N. Y.

Purifies the Blood

Hood's Sarsaparilla is characterized by three peculiarities: 1st, the combination of remedial agents; 2d, the proportion; 3d, the process of securing the active medicinal qualities. The result is a medicine of unusual strength, effecting cures hitherto unknown. Send for book containing additional evidence.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla tones up my system, purifies my blood, sharpens my appetite, and seems to make me over." J. P. THOMPSON, Register of Deeds, Lowell, Mass.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla beats all others, and is worth its weight in gold." I. BARRINGTON, 130 Bank Street, New York City.

ASSOCIATE EDITOR: MRS. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

THE FOURTH, falling on Sunday this year, gave ministers their pulpit themes, and the people an opportunity to observe the anniversary of our national independence after the fashion that used to prevail. It was once a common custom to hold religious services in the churches on the annual return of Independence Day, and to render thanks unto God as His mercies were recalled. It was a good practice, and its disuse is to be regretted. It would be well to restore the religious character that was once given to its observance. It is now kept only as a holiday—a day largely given up to excursions and amusement with fire-crackers and other pyrotechnics.

TRUTH.—A good sized chunk of wisdom is contained in the following short extract from the inaugural of Yale's new President. It is truth of the highest value, and pertinent in every meridian:

The fundamental idea of our theory of education is, I think, the superiority of man to his uses. Our first thought has been to develop the individual man roundly and fully in himself. The service which he does for the world is the natural outcome of what he is. The great evil of our national life is the one-sidedness of education. For this reason we have held to a prescribed and common course of study for each of our undergraduate departments. We believe that young men should not be disciplined and trained from the beginning for one thing only, that our students will be larger and wiser and more useful men, if a very broad foundation is laid and their minds opened to a wide survey of knowledge, if their thoughts are turned in part to things whose bearing on well being may not at first be fully understood.

THE DECISION of the Court of Appeals in the Eden Musée case is already working good results. That decision was, in short, tnat no theatrical performance, or exhibition of any kind on a stage, can be given without first obtaining license, and that license cannot lawfully be procured for such performances in any place where liquor is sold. This decision, in its practical effect, dooms all concert gardens, which it has heretofore been maintained were exempt from the theatrical license law because the word "concerts" does not appear in its text. The proprietors of these resorts must now take out licenses or abandon the concerts. If they sell liquor they cannot obtain a theatrical license, and if they get a liquor license and give exhibitions or concerts, charging admission to them, they are liable to arrest for violation of the theatrical license law. This is the dilemma in which they find themselves placed by the wise decision of the Court. As the sale of liquor, and not the price of admission to the concert hall, is their principal source of wealth, it is not likely that their liquor licenses will be surrendered.

It is gratifying to know that because of this decision, the prize-fight that was expected to have taken place at the Polo Grounds on Monday between Sullivan and Mitchell did not come off. The managers of the affair concluded that it would not pay to take out a theatrical license at a cost of $600, dispense with a bar as the law requires, and in addition to all this, run the risk of having the fight stopped by the police before it had fairly commenced. Commenting on this topic, the Tribune concludes: "It is no small thing to have lived to see this dawn of decency in New York. A few years ago when fights of this kind went on in Madison Square Garden under police supervision and in the presence of city officials, high in authority, nobody hoped to see the cause of morality so advanced as it is to-day."

OBEDIENCE is knowledge applied; it is belief in motion. To obedience Jesus looks to find the true test of friendship and love to Him. "Ye are my friends if ye do whatsoever I command you." "He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me." His disciples, therefore, need to do more than to look into their minds to see if they have knowledge of Christ, and into their hearts to see if they have the love of Christ; they need to look to their feet to see if they run in the way of Christ's commands, to ascertain whether their obedience is in accordance with their knowledge and professed belief. Jesus obeyed the law perfectly. "Though He was a Son, yet learned He obedience by the things which He suffered, and having been made perfect, He became unto all them that obey Him the author of eternal salvation." And to His disciples He said: "I have given you an example." Therefore no believer is justified in becoming so engrossed in his contemplation of Christ's cross of atonement as to allow it to obscure Christ's life of satisfying obedience, and in his rapture at the view of Calvary to think that he has nothing to do but to stand, clap his hands, and shout:

> "Hallelujah, 'tis done! I believe on the Son;
> I am saved by the blood of the Crucified One."

YALE.—We learn from one of our friends who was present that the inauguration of Professor Dwight as President last Thursday was a most interesting occasion. The weather was exceptionally fine and a very large audience was gathered, representing all classes and all parts of the country. The old Centre Church was crowded with a patient and attentive audience. The singing by the college choir was very effective. An address in Latin was made by Prof. Peck, after which Dr. Dwight delivered his inaugural, which was received with great applause. It was pertinent, able and judicious, representing the gradual change of the College into a University and indicating the unity of the different departments which would thus be secured. The new President dwelt upon the importance of a truly liberal education and the necessity of cultivating the soul and the whole character as well as the intellect. His assertion of the Christian origin, aims and tendencies of the institution elicited a strain of rapturous applause. The whole exercises were such as to give great satisfaction to all the friends of sound learning and evangelical truth.

Our Foreign Missions.

IT was mentioned last week that twenty-six thousand dollars will be needed to maintain our missions abroad from the first of July to the first of November. It is very desirable that as large a portion as possible of the amount may be given during the four months included in those dates. One of the chief sources of embarrassment in past years has been the decline of contributions during the summer. It is well to know clearly what we have to do and to make our plans so that provision shall be made for those dependent on us as their wants arise. It is not wise to postpone such provision and to accumulate obligations upon a future which is sure to have responsibilities enough of its own.

In the first place, let the Church remember that there has been no abatement in the efficiency and success of its missions in Asia. The good hand of our God is still with us. We are not called to mourn over the withholding of the Divine blessing. The reports coming to us from our representatives is not that no one believes their report or that the power of the Lord is not revealed. On the contrary, their constant appeals are for help to enable them to occupy new regions, new towns and villages and cities, from which earnest entreaties come to them for some one to preach the Gospel day after day among them, to guide their uncertain steps on the way of life, and to teach their children how to live intelligent and Christian and useful lives. An extending desire for a knowledge of the Word of God, the prosperity which it has been our wish and endeavor to attain, this it is which has made our missions what they are to-day and made their importunate demands what they are. Twice as many devoted men and women as now stand in our name on the Arcot districts in India, the Amoy region in China, at Yokohama, Tokio and Nagasaki in Japan, would have their hands full of hopeful work if we could send and support such an addition. There is a call to day on us to take up and care for twice as many, and more than twice as many, outlying settlements than we now occupy. It would be the work of a few months to organize twice as many Christian schools if the Church would authorize the employment of teachers. The schools now maintained have become almost weary of entreating us to give them teachers and facilities to enable them to rise to a higher standard of instruction. They ought to be lifted to a higher grade. The field needs it. The instruction already given, the diffusion of intelligence, have created a demand for a higher and more comprehensive system of education. The Arcot Seminary, the schools in China, the academies in Japan are all asking for men and women from us who shall do nothing but teach and superintend a system of education that may lift the people to a level with ourselves. This call has been increasing in urgency for the past four or five years. The needs of the Christian communities which have been given to us by the blessing of God call for this expansion and elevation of instruction in schools of various grades.

And while there has been and is this advance in Asia, God has been moving men here to offer themselves to undertake this larger work. One of the most serious questions before the Board of Foreign Missions at this very hour is whether it shall venture to accept the men now offering themselves to go in the name of our Church and take up the work importuning our missions for attention. This very day, while this number of this journal is on its way to those who read it, the Committee of the Board will be considering this very question, as it has been called to consider it for months past. The work is begging for the men and the men are begging us to send them out to do it. And now during these summer months, when the income of the treasury is declining, as it has always done at this time of the year, approved and accepted men are waiting to be sent. Unless the income is increased the money to send them must be borrowed. Our case is not singular. This is the experience of every missionary organization. But should there not be a revolution in this matter? Should not the present duty be the duty of the present, and not be postponed to a day in the future?

About eighty five thousand dollars a year are required to maintain these missions as they now are. This is remitted in monthly instalments, one-twelfth every month. Is it too much for eighty-two thousand Christians, such as we are, to give? Is it too much for more than forty thousand Christian families to give? Who will venture to declare that they cannot give two dollars each every year for such a work as this on which so much depends, and who will claim that they cannot give one of those two dollars within the coming ninety days? How many among us could send to this almost empty treasury of the Lord twice, three times, four times, five times that amount and practice no self-denial?

ARCHDEACON FARRAR.—About a year ago we objected to the florid rhetoric of some of the public addresses of Canon Farrar and were rapped over the knuckles for it repeatedly in private. A few days ago the mail delivered the London Athenæum, of June 12th, a well-known critical authority, and there this was found in a review of Dr. Farrar's "History of Interpretation":

"We have perused the lectures with mingled feelings of pleasure and discontent. Popularized scholarship clothed in a florid dress looks unseemly. The results of copious reading, the substance of many books, scraps of knowledge treasured in the memory and exhibited for the occasion, crowd the pages. The learning is more showy than solid. The author has not sufficiently pondered over and digested even important parts of his subject. His rhetoric carries him along too highly for that.

"The extraneous matter swells the bulk of the volume beyond due dimensions. If this were cut out the lectures might be vastly improved.

. . . . . .

"The last lecture ends with a high-flown laudation of theologians, preachers and others belonging to the Church of England. A few names of Nonconformists are given; but it is evident that the lecturer's knowledge of these outsiders is imperfect when he puts Lardner and Poole among churchmen and does not mention Dodridge. Nor can it be said that he is well acquainted with the theologians of Germany, though he parades the names of many."

We are not alone.

HAPPINESS is the conscious need of every soul, and the whole world is in quest of it. It is sought in various avenues and pursuits. Some seek it in riches, others in honors, only to meet with disappointment. After long and wearisome search they find that it is not a product of regal robes and rich mines. Solomon trod every path of pleasure, and exhausted every worldly resource of happiness, and inscribed "vanity and vexation of spirit" upon them all. It is related of the Moorish Caliph of Cordova, Abderman, that after his death this paper was found in his own handwriting: "Fifty years have elapsed since I became Caliph. I have possessed riches, honors, pleasures, friends; in short, everything that man can desire in this world. I have reckoned up the days in which I could say I was really happy, and they amount to fourteen." Think of it. Only fourteen days of happiness out of fifty years, or eighteen thousand two hundren and fifty days of affluence. What a commentary on the emptiness of the very best that the world can give!

Contrast this confession of the rich and favored Caliph of Cordova with the dying utterance of Hannah More, and perceive the superiority of her choice. She was pained at hearing some one speak of her good deeds, and whispered: "Do not mention them; I utterly cast them from me, and fall low at the foot of the Cross;" and then, her face lighting up with heavenly radiance, she exclaimed, "Joy," and passed away to her rest.

Very simple is the recipe for happiness that the all-wise Teacher gives: "Know and Do." That is all; and they who have tried it have found it unfailing. It never goes amiss; it never misleads; it never disappoints. In a fit of melancholy, Pope wrote:

"Man never is, but always to be blest."

True, as the world goes; not true, tested by our Saviour's rule. Pope maintained that the present was never a happy state to any human being. When asked if he really was of opinion that though, in general, happiness was very rare in human life, a man was not sometimes happy in the moment that was present, he answered: "Never, except when he is drunk." This was the verdict of a man who knew nothing of the joys of God's salvation.

Take the testimony to-day of the truly consecrated, and it will agree with that of all in the ages past who have lived to Christ, who have known Him, and obeyed Him in their lives, that the Christian religion yields true happiness, as nothing else does, as nothing else can—the happiness of a sure hope, the hope of the righteous, which is gladness, and a blessed peace; not the peace of exhaustion, not the peace of satisfied sensualism, not the peace of mental torpor and inaction, not the peace of apathy, not the peace of death, but the peace which is born of pardon, renewal, consecration, activity, life, in its fullest and most perfect sense.

En Voyage.

WHICHEVER way the wind doth blow
Some heart is glad to have it so;
Then, blow it East, or blow it West,
The wind that blows, that wind is best.

"My little craft sails not alone;
A thousand fleets from every zone
Are out upon a thousand seas;
What blows for one a favoring breeze
Might dash another with a shock
Of doom upon some hidden rock.

"And so I do not dare to pray
For winds to waft me on my way,
But leave it to a higher will
To stay or speed me, trusting still

"That all is well, and sure that He
Who launched my bark will sail with me
Through storm and calm, and will not fail,
Whatever breezes may prevail,
To land me, every peril past,
Within the sheltered haven at last.

"Then, whatsoever wind doth blow,
My heart is glad to have it so;
And, blow it East, or blow it West,
The wind that blows, that wind is best." —Selected.

"Old Colony" Papers.

DEATHS OF THE HALF-YEAR.

I.

THE ranks of literature and learning have been seriously thinned since the beginning of the year, though most of the dead are those whose work had long been done or nearly so. The most distinguished was Leopold Von Ranke, who died in his ninety-first year, having been professor at Berlin for over sixty years, and having published his first historical work sixty-two years ago. He has been well called "an intellectual athlete," having devoted himself to literary toil for at least eight hours a day with no exceptions in favor of rest or other occupation, taking only one meal a day, and wearing out his emanuenses by the vigor and rapidity of his work. At his death he was engaged on a history of the world, of which he had completed six volumes and left the notes and materials for the remaining three.

Archbishop Trench died at seventy-nine. He was a poet of thoughtfulness and finish, but was best known by his notes on the Parables and Miracles and his etymological writings, chiefly his little book on "The Study of Words." Principal Tulloch of St. Andrews was sixty-four, a writer of great critical power and a rich and vigorous style, but representing the broadest school of "orthodox" thought in theology. Few books are more delightful reading than his "Leaders of the Reformation." Sir Henry Taylor, who died at eighty-six, became famous fifty years ago by his drama of "Philip Van Artevelde," not as well known now as it ought to be. He wrote a number of other books of poetry and essays, though for fifty years in the Colonial department of the British civil service.

Edwin P. Whipple, who died at sixty-seven, was an essayist and critic of a high order. His "Literature of the Age of Elizabeth" is a most readable as well as scholarly book. He was a man of great modesty, but genial and ofttimes brilliant in private circles. Hudson, the Shakespearian writer and scholar, soon followed his great rival, Richard Grant White. Other writers who have died are Julian Schmidt, the historian of German Literature; John Russell Bartlett, author of the "Dictionary of Americanisms;" Robert Barry Coffin, once popular as an essayist on the lighter aspects of social life, under the name of "Barry Gray;" "Boiteau D'ambly," author of the "Adventures of Baron Trenck;" and A. S. Roe, a pleasant and once well-known writer of books for the young.

Science and learning have lost the Swiss naturalist and traveller, Tschudi, the great rabbinical scholar, Leopold Zunz, of Berlin; Michelis, the champion of Old Catholicism against the papal infallibility, and also distinguished for his attacks upon the theories of Haeckel and Hartman. Simonin, of Paris, wrote learned works on the mineral resources of France and America. Joseph Mayer was a noted archæologist and numismatist, and founded a valuable museum of art at Liverpool. He used his large fortune in similar efforts to advance the knowledge that he loved, among other things to enable Thomas Spencer to perfect his system of electro-plating. He also wrote books of exhaustive learning in the departments of archæology and art. Henry Stevens, a self-educated Vermont boy, became one of the most famous of bibliophiles, and supplied the British Museum with the larger part of its American publications, many of them of the rarest value, as well as obtained literary treasures for libraries and collectors in this country. Thomas Edwards, though a hand-loom weaver, became noted for his collections and investigations in natural history. His story, as told by Mr. Smiles, is a deeply interesting and stimulating narrative.

Other dead scholars and educators are Presidents Sturtevant of Illinois, James Eels of Lane Seminary, Professors Thacher of Yale, Tatlock of Williams, Hamlin of the Harvard Museum of Natural History, and Dr. Van Norman of this city; Rev. Dr. Geden of England, a Hebraist of distinction and a member of the Old Testament Revision Company; Dr. John W. Nevin, the great Coryphæus of the German Reformed Church; the accomplished Mrs. Erminie A. Smith of Jersey City, an expert in the Iroquois language and folk-lore, and at the time of her death engaged upon an Iroquois dictionary; and Henry Onderdonk, Jr., a specialist in the history and traditions of Long Island. John D. Philbrick spent a long life in the most valuable and eminent services to education. He held the highest positions in connection with the public schools of Massachusetts and Connecticut, and represented the United States as Commissioner of Education at the Paris Exposition. He was always in the advance of improved methods, such as evening schools, manual and industrial training, and the classification of schools from the kindergarten to the college. John T. Lanigan was a typical journalist in his brilliancy, capacity for rapid work, his Bohemian habits, and his early death.

Several distinguished physicians have died: Austin Flint of this city, the recognized leader among the "old school" of medicine; Alfred C. Post, the eminent surgeon and lecturer, as well as Christian philanthropist; A. M. Shew, Superintendent of the Insane Asylum at Middletown, Conn.; Samuel O. Vanderpoel, formerly Health Officer of this port, and the holder of many positions of great honor and trust in his profession; Dio Lewis, to whose sensible and interesting writings is due much of the progress in dietetic and gymnastic reform which marks our day.

The only lawyers of distinctively professional note are ex-Justices David Davis and Ward Hunt of the U. S. Supreme Court; Samuel Hand, ex Judge of the Court of Appeals of this State, and counsel in some of the most important suits which have been tried in that Court; Judge W. G. Whitely of the Superior Court of Delaware; and Henry J. Scudder, one of the leaders of the New York bar.

Some of the public men who have died were also lawyers; but, unlike the above, were best known outside of their profession. The most prominent of these was Horatio Seymour, who was eminently successful at every step of his political career except the final one, which was to have landed him at the White House. It was his fate to be nominated for the presidency against Gen. Grant, and his record during the War, however honest and loyal, had not been sufficiently pronounced to withstand the prestige of his opponent's great name and achievements. Ex Governor Michael Hahn of Louisiana refused to take the oath of allegiance to the Confederacy, and on the arrival of the Union forces in New Orleans bore a leading part in the reconstruction of the State. He was a member of Congress at the time of his death. He was a gentleman of high character and ability. Senator John F. Miller of California was also a lawyer, and served with distinction in the War, especially at Stone River and at Nashville. At the former battle he lost an eye, the ball, an ounce in weight, remaining in his head for twelve years. Congressman Joseph Rankin had been ill from Bright's disease for a year, but insisted upon being literally carried to his place in the House, presenting the most ghastly spectacle by his appearance, and still more by his frivolous jesting to the very last concerning his own moribund condition. He also had served in the War.

Other deaths of public men are those of ex Senator Chaffee of Colorado, a millionaire who lost a considerable part of his fortune by the failure of Grant & Ward, one of his daughters being the wife of U. S. Grant, Jr.; Benjamin Moran, an accomplished gentleman, who began life as a printer, and was in turn private Secretary of James Buchanan when Minister to England, Secretary of Legation at that Court, and for many years Minister to Portugal; ex-Senator David R. Atchison of Missouri, a pro-slavery leader in the Kansas-Nebraska troubles, an organizer of the Confederate forces in Missouri at the outbreak of the War, and acting President of the United States for a single day,—the Sunday which intervened between the expiration of Mr. Polk's term and the inauguration of General Taylor; and John Welsh of Philadelphia, ex-Minister to England, and to whom the success of the Centennial Exposition is mainly to be credited. He was a gentleman of the most attractive and energetic character, profoundly religious, and using his wealth and abilities in every good cause.

Abroad, we note the deaths of William E. Forster, one of the leaders of the Liberal party in England, and Chief Secretary for Ireland during the stormy times which resulted in the dynamite outrages, remaining an advocate of coercion to the last; Viscount Edward Cardwell, who had held positions in the Government since the days of Sir Robert Peel, and was chiefly instrumental in the reform of the British Army; Lord Redesdale, Chairman of Committees and Deputy Speaker of the House of Lords for thirty five years, a most eccentric nobleman who was sometimes mistaken for a servant, and who fell a victim to his obstinate determination never to wear an overcoat; and Count St. Vallier, who had represented France for more than a generation in nearly all the principal Courts of Europe.

Among the clergymen who have died, besides those already mentioned in other connections, was first of all the martyred Bishop Hannington of Africa, who was killed by the savage king of Uganda. He died on the way to that country, bidding his assassins tell the king that he had purchased the road to Uganda with his life and that he died for that people. The death of Dr. Constaus L. Goodell of St. Louis was that of a model man and minister, a man of fervid evangelical spirit and the most remarkable energy and success in every upbuilding work for Christ. Other great losses to the Church are the scholarly and admirable Henry M. Grout of Concord, Mass.; the eloquent and eccentric Dr. Jack of Hazleton, Pa.; E. W. Boardman, best known as the author of "The Higher Christian Life"; Henry R. Wilson, in early life a missionary to the American Indians and to the East Indies, and during his later years Secretary of the Domestic Mission and Church Extension Boards of the Presbyterian Church; Dr. J. R. W. Sloane, an able and earnest leader of the Reformed Presbyterians, and Professor in their Theological Seminary; and Hugh Stowell Brown, the eloquent preacher to the working classes of Liverpool, who rose from a locomotive engineer to the leadership of the English Baptists,—getting his earlier stages of education for the ministry in his engine, and chalking his first Greek exercises on the fire-box.

Several honored veterans have passed away: Pharcellus Church, a great man among the Baptists in his day; Greenleaf S. Webb, at the advanced age of ninety-seven, with whom our New Brunswick students have been familiar for nearly half a century; Samuel Wolcott, a distinguished Congregational minister, who spent the first years of his service as a pioneer missionary in Syria, in the troublous days of Mehemet Ali and of the war between the Maronites and the Druses; Robert B. Campfield, a man of great benevolence of character, and formerly widely known as District Secretary of the Am. S. S. Union; and Samuel K. Lothrop of Boston, a Unitarian of the Old and now almost extinct school, and a most accomplished Christian gentleman. I may also name Cardinal Jacobini, one of the most prominent and influential members of the Apostolic College at Rome; and the good and useful Rabbi Gutheim of New Orleans, around whose coffin the leading clergymen of every denomination, Protestant and Catholic, gathered as mourners and eulogists.

Our own Church has lost the venerable Abraham H. Myers, the faithful and beloved James B. Wilson, and the devoted James F. King.

Pencillings at Saratoga.

BY REV. THEODORE L. CUYLER, D.D.

IN all the thirty-eight summers that I have visited Saratoga I have never seen it so superbly beautiful. The June foliage and flowers are in their fresh perfection; the hotels have been cleansed and repainted for their expected guests; the whole town is like a fair bride adorned for her bridegroom. Those who have not been here since the war would not recognize the place; the improvement is as remarkable as that in the city of Washington since the ante-bellum days.

On Saturday the Grand Union Hotel opened for the season. Its fourteen hundred feet of frontage (on three streets) has been newly painted, and the interior grounds, with their overshadowing elms, their ferns and flowers, foliage and fountains, looked like a fairy scene. Over two millions of dollars have been lavished upon this, which may properly claim to be the most gorgeous hotel on the globe. Mr. Otter will be its proprietor in place of Mr. Clair. As the prosperity of Saratoga depends so much on its wonderful springs, the question is often raised, "May they not become exhausted—like silver mines and oil wells?" So far, there is not much appearance of it. The old Congress Spring—which was discovered in 1792—is as regular and reliable still as the Heidelberg Catechism, and just as wholesome in its influence. Last March a new Hathorn Spring was discovered,—about eighty feet east of the old one. The water foams and sparkles with all the virtues of its Siamese twin. The "Hathorn" is the most powerful cathartic water that I know of, as the "Columbian" is the most powerful of the tonic waters. The "Geyser" still holds its own as an aperient, and the "Vichy" as a valuable corrective of acidity in the blood. My friend Mr. P., who is here on his crutches, finds it helpful against that legion of tormentors popularly called rheumatism.

All the world has heard of the virtues of the Saratoga waters; but I verily believe that half the battle in the recuperation of invalids and over-worked and run down people is the wonderful air. I do not know of another such an atmosphere. It is as dry as the sandy soil of the plain on which Saratoga stands; and it is bracing with vigor as the north winds blow down three-fourths of the time from yonder Saccadaga mountains, which are the southern spur of the Adirondacks. To breathe this translucent purity to day is a perfect luxury. The oldest physicians claim that a case of indigenous malaria has never yet been known here. In saying all these true things about both the springs and the atmosphere, I am simply paying my humble debt of personal gratitude to the agencies which, under Providence, have lengthened my life. Let quacks puff their nostrums; but these springs and this inspiring atmosphere are the direct products of Him who is "wonderful in His workings."

During the last year about forty new villas and picturesque cottages have been erected. In time Saratoga bids fair to rival Newport in domestic architecture. The pulpits of the churches were never more strongly manned than at present. In the First Presbyterian Church is the Rev. Charles J. Young, whom our Reformed brethren were so reluctant to part with at Long Branch. He is likely to do as royal service for the Master here as he did there. Yesterday I found a fine congregation at the Second Presbyterian, of which the Rev. Wm. R. Terrett is the pastor. Heterodox churches never seem to have taken root here, although during the midsummer there are over twenty thousand people here on any given Sabbath. Of course the nuisance of the Sabbath-breaking daily papers infests Saratoga (by special express cars) as it does all our summer resorts. Every professed Christian who patronizes them is a participant in this breach of God's commandment. Nothing has done so much to undermine the sanctity of the Lord's day as these mercenary sheets.

In the olden times—when I was a Dutchman in dear old Market Street Church—I used to send my letters to the Intelligencer from a hotel which had no bar and always held a daily service of prayer in its parlors. After that hotel burned down, I removed my quarters to Dr. Strong's Institute on Circular street, where I have passed twenty consecutive summers (or fractions of them) most delightfully. We have a refined company of guests here, a wholesome table, and the parlor is crowded every morning at family worship. In the winter it is a sanitarium; in the summer it is a very sociable family hotel, with abundance of fertilizing talk on its piazzas. If my good Brother Ferris and he of the "Old Colony" will ever look in here they will find very much the same stamp of guests whom they have met at Friend Smiley's Christian hostelry on Lake Mohonk.

A Break in the Ranks.

THE withdrawal of the United Presbyterian Church of this country from the Alliance of the Reformed Churches, which was accomplished at the last meeting of the General Assembly of that Church, was certainly unexpected by the churches which remain in connection with the Alliance, and the announcement thereof will be received with regret. The reasons assigned for the withdrawal are two. First, that in the Council held at Belfast in 1884 hymns and paraphrases of Scripture were freely used, contrary to the conscientious convictions of the ministers and elders of the United Presbyterian Church then present, and in opposition to its public testimony; and second, that in the reception of churches to its confederation the Alliance has shown a disposition to interpret in a very lax, and in the view of the United Presbyterian Church, an improper way, the phrase "the consensus of the Reformed Churches," as shown in the admission of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. Accordingly direction was given to the Treasurer of the Church to pay all the dues of the Church to the Alliance, and to announce that it had discontinued its connection with the Presbyterian Alliance.

The right thus exercised is an undoubted one, and will be conceded readily by all the churches from which this greatly respected body departs. But we are sorry that in a time when the tendency toward greater unity among the Presbyterian churches of the world is growing, one of the various bodies hitherto grouped together should step out of the circle. There are not a few inside of this Church who will be pained by this "march to the rear" in a time of general movement forward, while in the general opinion of the Presbyterian communion it will be a matter of unfeigned regret.—The Presbyterian.

Young Men for the Ministry.

THIS extract from an article by H. E. J. in The Lutheran, will receive ready assent from every one interested in the subject:

"Let the very best young men of our congregations be urged to devote themselves to the ministry. One man of earnest faith, clear mind, and warm heart will be worth more to us than half a score of those who, while not insincere, are very imperfectly prepared, both by nature and by grace for the position of leaders among the hosts of Israel, where panics have so often to be checked, and lukewarm indifference to be spurred to action. The harvest of the Lord is, indeed, in need of laborers, but only of such as are ready for the preaching of the Gospel, to make every sacrifice and face every want. We do not need men who will have to be taken care of, but such, as if they find no field of labor, at hand, will create one for themselves, in the midst of the material so sadly neglected on all hands. Nor can we dispense with our system of beneficiary education. Yet this system should only supplement other means of obtaining our candidates. We would press the claims of the Christian ministry upon all classes of our people; the very wealthiest should give their sons, with the ampler advantages their means can furnish, no less than the very poorest for whom the Church has to provide. If peculiar business qualifications have enabled a man to gain position and influence and property, these same qualifications, transmitted as they so often are, will enable a son to accomplish a vast amount of good within the special work of the Christian ministry. The peculiar hardships of those who struggle with poverty, will enable them to preach the Gospel to the poor; while a childhood and youth, accustomed to other circumstances, will prove a good preparation for another sphere within this office. In a word, as the Gospel goes to all classes, so must they, who proclaim it, come from all classes in the community. This is what it demands, even though the Spirit of God is not bound to any such necessities."

We are thankful for items of Church News compactly stated, or for marked copies or clippings from local exchanges, which we would not otherwise see. To insure publication in next number, they must reach us by noon on Monday. A condensation of items is unavoidable

Hope College Commencement.

THIS Institution has now finished the 20th year of its corporate existence; and the exercises of Commencement week have been attended by larger numbers and with manifest increase of interest. Its influence seems to be growing from year to year.

The Baccalaureate sermon on Sunday evening, June 20th, was by Rev. Richard H. Steele, D D., of Ann Arbor, Mich. He will be recognized as the former genial pastor of the First Reformed Church, New Brunswick, N. J. The discourse was an able presentation of the truth that the student must aim for a high Christian manhood, with Jesus as his model. A large audience appreciated the doctor's sermon.

On Monday night occurred the inauguration of Rev. Chas. Scott, D D., as President of Hope College. Rev. P. Lepeltak, President of the Council, conducted the services, assisted by Rev. D. Broek, Rev. N. H. Dosker and Dr. Richard H. Steele. The sermon, which was very appropriate and acceptable, was preached by Rev. W J. R Taylor, D.D., of Newark, N. J. The charge was given by Rev. Peter Lepeltak, after which Dr. Scott delivered his inaugural address.

Prof. Scott has been acting and provisional President since 1878, but now for the first time has the position in due form. His service in Hope College began July 1st, 1866, and it is to be hoped, that as he has witnessed its early struggles and labored through its difficulties, he may now be blessed with a successful administration. The Alumni, students and trustees joined in giving him hearty congratulations at the close of the service.

Unusually interesting were the closing rhetorical exercises of the Grammar School Department at the College Chapel on Monday afternoon at 2.30 o'clock.

The speakers and their themes were: Submission to Lawful Authority, a Primary Attribute of Good Citizenship, Clinton L. Dayton. Gen. Scott and the Veteran, Herman S. Juistema. The Blue and the Gray, Mary E. Steffens. Concerning Chambermaids, William H. Bruins. The Great Struggle, Henry Kleyn. A Stump Speech, John G. Huizinga. Des Sängers Fluch, Martha M. Nyland. The Village Bell, Martin Flipse. Sermon of Brother Watkins, Henry Van Engelen. Dross and Gold—(Dialogue), Isaac Van Kampen, Mamie Thompson, Ella M. Hunt, Kate E. Herold, Ida N. Nies, Sarah Cappon, Rosa M. Doyle, Albert J. Rooks, Herman S. Juistema. "The Lips that Touch Liquor Shall Never Touch Mine," Kate J. Den Herder. Burial of Moses, James Oosewaarde. Nasby Joins the Communists—"Capital is a Krime," John M. Van Der Meulen. The Pauper's Deathbed, John De Beer. Fritz's Courtship, Harry Kremers. Van Bibber's Rock, Kate E Herold. The Power of Habit, Philip Sculen. Pointer's Dyspeptic Goat, Aart Van Westrienen. Essay and Valedictory—Step by Step, Maggie Van Putten.

The music, with which the exercises were interspersed, was by the students. Some of the pieces were of unusual merit and secured the rapt attention of a large audience.

The twenty first Commencement was held at Hope Church on Wednesday evening, June 23d. The church was tastefully decorated and crowded with an attentive and orderly audience. On the stage were seated the officers of the College, those who were to receive degrees, and visitors. The following were the orators and their subjects: Latin Salutatory, Jeremias Kruidenier, Holland City, Mich. Highways to Success in Life, William J. Dulker, Grand Haven, Mich. The Pioneer, John W. E. Visscher, Holland, Mich. Relations of Labor and Capital, B. William Lammers, Cedar Grove, Wis. Decisive Action, Peter Holleman, Drenthe, Mich. Thoughts on Intellectual Life, with the Valedictory, Ralph Bloemendaal, Cedar Grove, Wis.

Then followed the conferring of certificates upon members of the "A" Class, and of degrees: A. B. upon Ralph Bloemendaal, William J. Dulker, Peter Holleman, Jeremias Kruidenier, B. William Lammers, John W. E. Visscher. A.M., in Course, upon Class of 1883.

Master's Oration—Oriental Woman, and Missions, Albert Oltmans, Grand Rapids, Mich.

The speakers did credit to themselves and their Alma Mater. The Master's Oration, late as it was, was listened to with general pleasure and marked applause. The good music added to the enjoyment of the evening; and this twenty-first Commencement passed with pleasant memories and bright omens for the future.

One more characteristic meeting characterized the week. On the evening of Tuesday in the chapel were held the public exercises of the Alumni. These occasions at Hope are full of life and spirit, and create a decided influence for good upon the Institution. After an address by Jacob J. Van Zanten, A.M., of Orange City, Iowa, and "Chronicles" of the College, by Rev. J. Meulendyk, of Fremont, Mich, the interest of the evening was kept up until a late hour by responses to the following toasts: "The Majority of Hope," by Rev. Wm. H. Phraner; "Rutgers and Hope," by Rev. Wm. J. R. Taylor, D D.; "The Northwestern Academy," by Rev. John A. De Spelder. As usual the Alumni felt that they had had a very enjoyable time. H.

Co-operation in Foreign Missions.

AS it is a matter of deep importance, we publish an exact copy of the resolutions on this subject, adopted by the late General Synod, as follows:

1. That the General Synod of the Reformed Church in America heartily approves the stand taken by its Board of Foreign Missions, in their paper submitted for its judgment, on the important subjects of Union and Co operation in Foreign Missions; of self-support and self-government in the native churches established; and of Co operation between Home Boards of different churches in the selection and occupancy of contiguous fields in foreign lands; and that this General Synod will be prepared to take the necessary legislation to give effect to the views of the Board, as occasion shall arise.

2. That the Classis of Arcot be permitted and advised to initiate such measures as shall tend to bind together the churches of the Presbyterian polity in India.

3. That this Synod will endorse the union of the Classis of Arcot with such a Union Church of Christ in India, composed of those holding the Reformed faith and Presbyterian polity.

4 That the Rev. Jacob Chamberlain, D D, be commissioned to present to such of the Presbyterian General Assemblies as he may be able to visit (in passing through Great Britain on his expected return to India in 1887) the fraternal greetings of this body, and to draw their attention to the unanimous action taken by this body in favor of Organic Union on mission fields of those holding the Reformed faith with the Presbyterian polity, in the hope that similar permissive action may be taken by their respective bodies, authorizing their missions in India to take part in such a Union.

The Corner-Stone of a New Church Laid.

LAWYERSVILLE, N. Y., June 23d, 1886.

REV. JACOB WEST, D D.—Dear Brother: The corner-stone of our new church at Cobleskill was laid last Thursday, June 17th. Though the weather looked threatening, still a goodly assembly gathered to attend the ceremonies. Rev. Joseph P. Davis, from Albany, delivered an appropriate and admirable address. Rev. J. G. Smart represented the Classis with a congratulatory address. Rev. B. Smits, of Constantine, Mich., and the pastors of the Lutheran and Methodist churches assisted in the services.

We expect the building to cost us $6,000 before it is completed. Our Sunday services are still well attended and prospects are hopeful. The building is to be completed by the middle of September. We earnestly hope the Board may not disappoint us in the $1,000 applied for. Very truly yours,

John G. Fagg.

....The Classis of Kingston met in the Church of New Paltz, N. Y., Tuesday, June 22d. The licentiate, Mr. Abel H. Huizinga, was received by letter from the Classis of Holland; and as his examination had been satisfactorily sustained at a former session, he was ordained to the office of the ministry, and installed pastor of this ancient church, formed by the Huguenots two centuries ago. An appropriate sermon was preached by the Rev. Richard P. Milliken from 1 Cor. 9:16. The excellent charge to the pastor was given by Rev. Stephen D. Noyes, and a spirited address to the people was made by Rev. Matthew N. Oliver. The President of Classis, Rev. Wm. H. Vroom, presided and offered the prayer of ordination. A goodly number of ministers from other Classes were present at these interesting services. S. C.

....The Classis of New Brunswick met June 17th and ordained and installed Robt. V. Palmer, of the last Class of the Seminary, as pastor of the Church of Griggstown, N. J. Rev. H. D. B Mulford preached the sermon from John 3:30. Dr. W. H. Campbell gave the charge to the pastor, and Rev. Alex. McWilliam to the people. S. C.

....The Classis of Rensselaer met at Schodack, N. Y., Tuesday, June 22d. After the requisite examinations the Rev. Norman Plass was received from the New Haven Central Association, ordained and installed.

Our beloved, though aberrant brother, Dr. John McC. Holmes, of Albany, a friend of the pastor, preached the sermon. The name of the preacher is a guarantee of the excellence as well as brilliance of his presentation of "Christian Positivism." The charges to pastor and people, given respectively by Revs. Theo. S. Brown and Wm. Veenschoten (the recent pastor of the church) were exceedingly impressive and, at times, of touching tenderness. The President of Classis, Rev. Alan D. Campbell, presided and read the forms.

Mr. Plass, though educated elsewhere, has a birthright and ancestral home in our Church. He receives a hearty welcome from the Classis as well as from his glad and thankful people. He comes to a united and prosperous church that will not be less kind because of its grateful memories of him who has gone. "Peace be within thy walls and prosperity within thy palaces." S. C.

....The Rev. James F. King.—The Consistory of the Church of Roxbury, N. Y., of which Mr. King was pastor, have adopted a minute expressive of their high "appreciation of his Christian work and character" as exhibited during his brief pastorate, of the fact that he became very dear to them, and that although he was young in years they were impressed with his ripe Christian experience, and that his death at the outset of a career full of promise is to them a solemn admonition, giving emphasis to the inspired warning: "Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh." Many hopes were blighted by the early translation of this earnest and gifted young Christian minister to a higher service; but his life has made a durable impression upon those who knew him. It is true of him that "being dead, he yet speaketh," and the fact that his addresses, being limited to a few months, were few in number, results in an unusually distinct remembrance of them.

....Long Branch, N. J.—This church has lately called Rev. Ed. Cornet, of Blue Hill, Neb, who is entering upon his work with very encouraging prospects. Only last communion the new pastor's heart was made glad by welcoming twelve into the church. The people are drawing their pastor into their affections by many acts of kindness. They have renovated the parsonage from top to bottom,—each one of the thirteen rooms has been newly papered preparatory to the reception of the pastor's family, who will come East this month. The old pulpit has been taken away and the church services are well attended. The consistory join heart and hand with their pastor in his efforts for their good, and altogether the outlook is very hopeful.

....Anniversary and Children's Day at Passaic, N J, June 13th.—These were combined in the services of the Church of Aquackanonck. In the evening it was my privilege to participate in the service. I hardly knew the place. The old edifice has been so completely rejuvenated and beautified as to make an exceedingly attractive audience-room. It was thoroughly packed by the school and the congregation. The school came into the church in procession, headed by the beloved pastor, Rev. Dr. J. Gaston. As they entered they sang a beautiful processional hymn. Prayer, singing, exercises by the children, an address by Rev. Dr G H. Mandeville, presentation of prizes to children for attendance, and a surprise-gift to the superintendent by the teachers that nearly took away his breath and made the heartfelt reply of thanks an exceedingly difficult thing to utter, constituted a programme that filled up the evening. It did the heart good to witness the evident interest of all in the care of the children, and the manifold evidences of earnest, active church life. Pastor and people, teachers and scholars, have reason to rejoice in the "good hand of the Lord upon them for good." May coming years be equally fruitful, yea, and still more abundantly. G. H. M.

....Middle Collegiate Church, Lafayette Place, N. Y.—The summer festival of the Sunday-school was celebrated Tuesday evening, June 22d. The children gathered in the church and rendered a musical service of a high order with spirit. The Rev. Dr. Sabine made an appropriate address and Dr. Chambers presented a large number of Bibles to scholars who had earned them by fulfilling the established conditions. Ice cream and cake were afterwards served in the basement. Eight hundred persons were present.

....HOPEWELL, N. Y.—Mr. Jaques Cortelyou, of this church, who last March celebrated his 90th birthday, still retains his noted kindness for ministers, and especially for his own pastors. A few days ago he invited his present pastor and wife to call at his house, when Mr. Cortelyou presented Mrs. Polhemus with a costly and handsome gold watch and chain as a token of his friendship and esteem. This valuable gift is a specimen of the liberal and generous acts of kindness that Mr. Cortelyou has shown to all his pastors.

....COHOES, N. Y.—The pastor's Bible class adjourned on the last Sunday in June until the first of October. The final hour was mostly spent in singing, and Rev. J. P. Strong addressed the class in affectionate and feeling words. He considered it remarkable that in the long roll of sixty members there had not been a death, nor a case of serious illness during the year. Then he dwelt upon the uncertainties of life and hoped that all of the sixty would be able to answer "here" at the first roll call next fall. Contrary to the usual custom the old roll was preserved and will be called at the first meeting. Heretofore a new roll has been started every fall. The class is an honor to the church and stands first among all the church organizations in the estimation of the pastor, and the members have deep respect for him.

....The church at KISKATOM, N.Y, observed the day, June 27th. The pulpit was decked with a profusion of flowers. The pastor, Rev. Geo. J. Van Neste, preached a sermon on the "deceitfulness of little sins," using for his chief illustration a "little fox." The children recited many verses of Scripture, beside entire Psalms. The young choir added greatly to the services. The church was crowded and the entire audience separated with a satisfaction seldom so complete on like occasions. Rev. Dr. Anson Du Bois shared in the devotional exercises and dropped a few timely words to the interested audience. "Would that we might have such services oftener," and "We wish the Domine would preach often to the children," were common expressions which followed the services. V.

....WESTERN ITEMS.—Dr. H. P. Oggel and Mr. J. J. Van Zanten have been appointed professors in the Northwestern Academy, Orange City, Iowa ...Candidate E. W. Stapelkamp has accepted a call from the Second Church, Grand Haven, Mich., and D. Scholten from Philadelphia, Kansas. ....Bethany Church, Pella, Iowa, organized last winter, has been blessed in the conversion of souls, most of them young people. The youthful organization also rejoices in a house of worship of her own, a very convenient and suitable church erected by the Methodists, and bought from them by our people. E. Beyer, member of the Senior class of New Brunswick Theological Seminary, has been engaged to supply this church during his summer vacation.

....PHILADELPHIA, PA.—The attendance at the communion service in the Third Church, June 27th, was unusually large Nine members were received into the church, and others are expecting to follow their example.

....CHILDREN'S DAY SERVICES — The church at South Bend, Ind., held these services, June 20th. The chorus singing both morning and evening was excellent. The "collection song" by the church school infant class with marching accompaniment and the duet "Galilee," with guitar accompaniment, were pleasing.

The recitations, "Nothing to Do," by six girls, and "Loving Words" also by five little girls, were handsomely rendered. "Thank God for the Bible," introduced the contribution of the day, which was for purchasing five cent Testaments for destitute children.

In the evening the children and older persons enjoyed a fine treat. It was an interesting description of the educating and Christianizing of the Indian boys and girls of the far West by Mr. Josiah W. Hambleton, who was a missionary among the Oregon Indians for eighteen years.

The "Flower Mission" ended the services of the day. By the kindness of the ladies of the church and the girls of the two Sunday-schools, many beautiful plants and flowers were provided, which were handsomely arranged on Saturday evening. At the close of the Sunday evening service four ladies, by request of the pastor, acted as a committee to distribute the cut flowers to the sick, the infirm and aged of their acquaintance; a part of the service not only worthy of mention, but also of remembrance for future Children's Day exercises. W.

....THREE BRIDGES, N. J.—Children's day was observed by the Sunday school on Sunday, June 13th with appropriate exercises. The church was beautifully trimmed with flowers and ferns by the ladies of the congregation, who showed great taste and skill; the principal attraction being an arch of beautiful flowers encircling the platform, back of which was suspended a large bell made of daisies; on the left stood a ladder of roses, on the right a column of white roses, in front a pyramid of flowers, with many other beautiful floral designs, among which were canary birds that seemed to enjoy the part they had been brought to perform.

The children occupied the front seats. The church was packed with people, many of whom could not be provided with seats. The exercises consisted of recitations, responsive readings, choruses, solos, quartets, and an address by the pastor, Rev. Eugene Hill. All who took part acquitted themselves creditably, especially the twelve small children who gave a recitation, which was a riddle for the audience to guess, and which was so nicely done—the children speaking loud enough to be heard by all, and with the twelve bannerettes that they held in their hands—that no one could fail in guessing the riddle, which was "Children's Day." The floral offering by seven girls was also well done. Master Willie Bartow, of Bound Brook, had been engaged to play the cornet with the choruses, which, with the good singing of the whole school, was grand. The exercises were all under the management of the Superintendent, Mr. J. V. F. Dilts. Altogether, it was a pleasant entertainment, which the children will long remember, and must have an influence to lead them in the right way. H. C. C.

Union College Commencement.

AMONG the prominent incidents of Commencement at Union this year are noted the following:

The Rev. Dr. Ormiston preached a most able Baccalaureate sermon on Sunday evening, the 20th ult. Hon. Warner Miller, U. S. Senator, as Honorary Chancellor, gave a statesmanlike address, on Commencement Wednesday, upon the relations of educated men to politics. Hon. John H. Starin was elected a life trustee, greatly to the satisfaction of the alumni and friends of the College. The degree of A.B. or C.E. was given to twenty-one graduates. The degree of Ph D was given to Prof. Cady Stanley, the popular Dean of the Faculty; A.M. to Col. Daniel S. LaMonte, class of '72; D D. to Revs. S. B. Rossiter, Teunis S. Hamlin and James W. Crocker; LL.D. to the Hon. Warner Miller, U. S. Senator, and Hon. John Ira Bennett of Illinois, all graduates of Union.

No President is yet chosen. Meanwhile the Hon. J. S. Landon, LL.D., of the Supreme Court, and temporary President, is filling that high position with eminent ability and satisfaction; and the tone and prospects of the College are excellent. D.

S. Oakley Van der Poel, M.D., LL.D.

AT a meeting of the Board of Trustees of Rutgers College held on Tuesday, June 22d, 1886, the Chair announced the decease of this eminent citizen, and a committee, consisting of Judge Bradley, Judge Bookstaver and Rev. Dr. Chambers, was appointed to prepare a minute, which is as follows:

The Board greatly deplores the loss it has sustained in the sudden removal of one of its most active and useful members. Dr. Van der Poel was an enlightened friend of education in all its branches and was well fitted by his studies and acquirements, and also by his experience, to give wise and timely aid to all concerned in its advancement. For eleven years he was a member of this body, was faithful in attendance upon its meetings, and was helpful by his counsel and his gifts to its varied interests. There are many other circles, public and private, in which his genial presence will be greatly missed, but few will have so much reason as we to mourn the privation. It is a duty as well as a pleasure to put on record our testimony to his excellence as a man of true public spirit, a friend of sound learning, a helper in every good work, and especially as an intelligent and unwearied advocate of the American Collegiate system, in both its intellectual and its moral aspects. He believed in a training which should be large and liberal, yet thorough and Christian, and he had the courage of his convictions. DAVID D DEMAREST, Secretary.

NEW BRUNSWICK, June 28th, 1886.

The General Outlook.

....The Rev. Dr. Kittredge, pastor elect of the Madison Avenue Reformed Church of this city, closed his pastorate of the Third Presbyterian Church of Chicago the last Sabbath in June. At the communion service in the morning he had the satisfaction of welcoming sixty-six new members into the fellowship, thirty-nine of whom were by confession—a remarkable accession at the close of a pastorate.

In the evening Dr. Kittredge preached his last sermon in which he stated that, during the sixteen years of his pastorate the church had received 1,684 members on profession and 1,784 by letter. Its present membership is about 2,300. It was also stated that the attendance upon the weekly prayer meetings, during the past year had been from six to eight hundred that during the last sixteen years, the church had gathered 2 000 children into its Sabbath-school; had sent out three colonies in other sections of the city, and had stretched out the hands of sympathy to an abused heathen race, having now six Chinamen among its membership. Dr. Kittredge also stated that while, for the year ending April 30, 1883, the collections of the church had aggregated $39,214, for the year closing on 30th of April last they amounted to $69,581.

....The thirty-third anniversary of Dr. J. P. Wilson's pastorate in the South Park Presbyterian Church, Newark, N. J., was recently celebrated by a reception. He has been present at every communion administered since his installation. The chapel in which the reception was held was the place in which he commenced his ministrations as pastor. The church edifice now occupied by the congregation was dedicated on February 15th, 1855. The number of communicants thirty-three years ago was sixty seven; it is now near five hundred.

....Mr. Moody has issued a call for an evangelical conference to be held in Northfield, Mass., from August 4th to 15th, "for Bible study and upon methods of work in home and foreign evangelization, and for the promotion of individual consecration to Christ." A general attendance of all interested is invited.

....Mr. Spurgeon has issued his 1,900th sermon; his church has now a membership of 5,214.

....Archbishop Feehan, of Chicago, recently confirmed 117 convicts in the Joliet Penitentiary, Ill

....A Methodist missionary in India reports the baptism of 453 persons within a fortnight, among the Tharus, an aboriginal tribe of the Gonds.

... The British and Foreign Bible Society has issued a "penny" New Testament in the Welsh language, and an amended version of St. Luke's Gospel in Irish.

...The First Presbyterian Church of Cranbury, N. J., claims the honor of leading off in the observance of "Children's Day," and is glad that it now has so large a following. It has kept such a day for more than twenty years, and reports that on the second Sabbath of June fourteen children received each a Bible for reciting the Shorter Catechism. One of them was four years and five months old when she made her perfect recitation.

The Book.

BY SUSAN TEALL PERRY.

ALL the pages of the Book,
Clearer, dearer, seem to me,
As my western sun goes down,
And the red and gold I see.
Travel-stained, with loads opprest,
It is sweet to read of rest.

In the heat of noonday glare,
When the work was piled so high,
Of the chapters, only one,
When the day was passing by,
Could I find the time to read,
And I took but little heed.

But the lessons I've since learned
Kept me longer at the Book.
Disappointments, changes came,
And I had to stop to look
For the promise of His care
At all times and everywhere.

As the loved ones went away,
I read more about the place
Where they'd entered in and looked
On the beauty of His face.
Revelations then became
But a letter written plain.

Oft I've thought when sundown comes
I would like to sit just so,
With the Book here on my lap,
Resting on it as I go.
Loved ones finding me would say,
"With the Book she passed away."

STROWBRIDGE, MASS.

Mrs. Loring's Discipline.

BY MARY E. BRUSH.

CHAPTER IV.

AS Mrs. Loring stood on the broad steps awaiting an answer to her ring, her ear caught the murmur of voices within. Not the musically modulated tones one would think appropriate to so palatial a residence, but instead, confused sounds of a high-pitched falsetto in altercation with another voice of a shrill, foreign accent.

"Elise! You're a perfect goose! Can't you think of something to do, instead of standing there staring at me and groaning out your outlandish lingo?"

"Pardon, madame! But it is to me a dreadful sight that you do present! Malheureusement! Will it not come off,—that wretched black?"

"I don't know, I'm sure! It's all your fault; forever leaving my bottles in such confusion! There! I told you I thought I heard the bell! Thank goodness! it's the doctor, I guess! Hurry to the door and let him in for Julius has gone on an errand. Do hurry, Elise!"

The next minute the door was flung open and Ruth stood face to face with a tall, slim-waisted French maid, whose white cap with its coquettish, red ribbon bows, stood somewhat awry on her shining, black braids, and whose face beneath wore an expression of anxious expectancy which changed into despair as she beheld a stranger in place of the medical man she had hoped to see.

"Hélas!" clasping her long, lean hands in a tragic way, "It is not monsieur, le docteur! What will my poor mistress do!"

Ruth's sympathies were aroused. Evidently there was trouble of some sort.

"No, I am not the doctor," she said, pleasantly, "but the person Mr. Green, the florist, sent to attend to the decorations. May I inquire if anything serious is the matter? Anyone sick? Can I be of assistance?"

Elise's practiced eyes at once beheld that her interlocutor, in spite of plain attire, was a lady, and she exclaimed effusively, "Ten thousand thanks, madame! Yes, we are in affliction indeed! A few minutes ago my poor dear mistress had the misfortune to use the wrong bottle and,"—here Elise paused impressively, then finished the sentence with a volley of French interjections.

"She took nothing poisonous, I hope!" Ruth exclaimed, considerably startled.

"She took nothing internally, madame. She merely bathed her face with what she thought was cologne, but what turned out to be a patent hair-dye—a most excellent article in its place. Something I advised her to use, for," lowering her voice a little, "her once beautiful hair is becoming gray. But as I said, the room was rather dark, she was in haste and thought it was cologne and"—here the maid's animated description was brought to a sudden close by a voice from the adjoining room calling impatiently, "Elise! Are you never coming? If it is the doctor, bring him in immediately."

"It is not he, madame. It is a person, a lady from monsieur, the florist."

"From the florist's, you say? Let her come in then. The decorations must be attended to at once, though," peevishly, "I'm sure if there's no remedy for this face of mine, I shall have to postpone my entertainment."

The next minute Ruth found herself in a small but sumptuously furnished apartment. Her weary feet sank into soft velvet carpets. Her eyes met a mingling of rich colors and elegant bric-á-brac. In the mellow but subdued light that sifted in through the blue and amber panes of a stained-glass window, she beheld sitting in a large easy chair an elderly lady of spare frame, attired in an elaborate satin wrapper. Evidently in her young days she had been a blonde of the purest type, for her eyes were a bright blue, her abundant hair, though frosted by age, showed gleams of former gold, and the wrinkled throat revealed by the filmy lace kerchief was as fair as a babe's. But the face above it! What a startling contrast! It was as black as a negro's. So, too, were the fingers and half the palm of her small, slim right hand.

She gave Ruth a piercing glance, her own face, meantime, wearing an expression of mingled amusement and annoyance.

"Good afternoon. So you are sent by Mr. Green? Humph! I didn't know that he had lady assistants. I hope it will be an improvement on that Bailey; he hadn't a particle of taste and was real saucy, too! Well, I'll tell you what I want done, in a few minutes. I am waiting for the doctor. I have made an awkward mistake, owing to Elise's carelessness. I had a bit of headache and when I lay down for my nap I thought I'd bathe my face and forehead with cologne, and then almost before I knew it I was all plastered with that wretched hair dye! I only hope it won't poison me!"

"I trust not, madam," said Ruth politely, all the time trying to overcome her nervousness. "But it seems to me that it ought to be removed at once, before it penetrates the skin and the stains be lasting."

"Soap and water doesn't take it off; I tried them at once. I couldn't think of anything else, I was so shocked. As for Elise, she is scared out of the few wits she possesses. Oh, what shall I do! Can't you think of something?"

Now it so happened that Mr. Guy Loring had had a taste for chemistry and in his amateur experiences Ruth had been an interested assistant. She had picked up no little knowledge of various fluids and gases and their peculiarities. She took up the bottle of hair dye, smelled its contents, and recognizing the scent of familiar ingredients, said:

"This compound is really of little worth. Its color cannot be permanent and I don't doubt that after a day or two your face will resume its natural complexion. But if you wish to remove the stain at once, some acid must be applied. I would suggest lemon juice. That, at least, can do no harm."

"Lemon juice! Hurry, Elise, down to the housekeeper and ask her for some. Be just as quick as you can!"

Away ran the French maid as fast as her high heels would carry her.

"She's a good-hearted creature," remarked Miss Isabel, "and she has exquisite taste in dressing me and arranging my hair, but she is not half so careful about things as was Margery, my Scotch woman. But I guess Elise will learn after awhile. I haven't had her long. There! she's actually coming back already!"

Elise entered, bearing a cup containing the lemon juice, which she proceeded to apply with a sponge to her mistress's face. Like magic it wiped away the dingy black! Brows, nose and cheeks resumed their natural color. So did the stained fingers and palm.

"Oh dear me! Is it really off!" exclaimed the old lady, peering eagerly into the carved ivory hand-mirror Elise held before her. "All off! Why so it is! What a relief! How shall I repay you—Mrs.—Mrs.—um,—what did you say your name was?"

Ruth, considerably embarrassed, answered in a low, muffled voice, and as Miss Thornton was slightly deaf, she caught the name incorrectly. "Lawton? Ah, thank you Mrs. Lawton! Well, I'm very grateful indeed! I was really afraid that I was doomed to be a regular black-a-moor! And I didn't know but that it would spoil my skin forever! I have always been rather proud of it, too, and never used any cosmetic. There! Elise! There's the bell! It's the doctor, this time, I guess. Tell him I don't need him, that I had a slightly bad turn; but am all right now. He's so busy that he'll be thankful that he doesn't have to stay. But don't you breathe a word to him about my using the hair dye. He'd never stop teasing me about it. He's forever making fun of my scares. Come, Mrs. Lawton, I feel all right now, and we'll make a tour of the rooms and you can see what will be necessary."

It was plainly seen that the imperious old lady had taken a notion to the quiet, little woman who had so opportunely come to her rescue. She treated Ruth's suggestions as to the floral decorations with unusual consideration, and thus the work progressed without friction or hindrance of any kind.

The close of the following day found all arrangements perfected. The interior furnishing of the house was of the heavy, dark toned order, needing the varied hued blossoms to brighten its sombre grandeur, and this effect had been obtained by Ruth's charming taste. Clusters of golden petalled roses gleamed like bits of sunshine from high, dark mantels, cabinets and bookcases; gloomy niches were relieved by bunches of pure white and blood red carnations, breathing out their spiciness; pots of azaelias made avenues of pink bloom on either side of the long dining room; the shining silver and glass on the table reflected the myriads of blossoms placed among them. Green, trailing vines draped windows and cornices. Every room seemed a bower of bloom and fragrance. All was finished. The sun had gone down in the western sky, leaving a faint crimson tinge on the snow-clad hills. Inside the grand house soft-shod servants flitted here and there lighting the glittering crystal chandeliers in the ball-room and parlors and the fragrant, waxen tapers in dining-room; the anxious eyed caterer, surrounded by his dapper assistants, was holding an earnest conversation with the family butler; the band, stationed in a fern screened alcove in the wide hall, began tuning their various instruments, filling the house with long drawn out stains, harmonious and discordant.

Ruth, tired after her labors and the nervous strain imposed by her peculiar position, stood with her wraps on, ready to depart. But first she must slip into the library; the one room in the house that had a strong fascination for her. For here, in a massive frame, hung a life-like picture of Guy, her dear, dead husband, taken when he was a little boy, scarcely more than a babe. How precious was that fair young face, those soulful eyes, the mouth with its rich, red curves and the rings of hair curled about the noble brow! To think of the grand manhood he had attained; what a tender husband he was to her! What a loving father to Ray and Beth! And now he was dead, lying fathoms deep beneath treacherous waves! No wonder that poor Ruth, brought to a fresh realization of her loss, sank down before the picture and gave vent to her grief in low sobs. Suddenly there fell upon her ear the sound of a footfall. She sprang from her crouching attitude, turned and confronted—Miss Isabel Thornton!

There was a look of blank amazement on that lady's face,—a look not unmixed with indignation. Miss Thornton hated anything like "a scene." What right had this stranger, this workingwoman, to act in this tragic manner? She must be insane! Miss Thornton reached out one slender, white hand sparkling with diamonds and touched Ruth, a trifle roughly, perhaps, on the shoulder.

"What are you doing!" she said in tones that jarred the ear of the sensitive hearer. "Are you crazy? I must say that I don't care to have such theatrical goings-on in my house!"

Ruth drew herself up proudly. "I beg your pardon, madam," she said, striving to speak steadily, though there was an indignant flash from her soft gray eyes, "I ought to have better controlled my emotion. I would never have entered your house had not duty to my employer compelled me. I believe that I have performed that duty satisfactorily and I was just going away, when I took the liberty of coming in here and looking at this picture, which is"—here Ruth's voice faltered—"is very dear to me!"

"Dear to you! My nephew Guy's picture dear to you!" in astonishment.

"Guy was my husband, madam. You have hitherto misunderstood my name. It is not Lawton. I am Ruth Loring. Good evening, madam."

And before the astonished mistress of the house could collect her faculties "Mr. Green's lady assistant" was gone.

(To be continued.)

THE report of George Muller's work for 1885 is summarized as follows: Last year, without applying to a single person, his receipts amounted to $200,000. He has received in all from the beginning more than $5,000,000.

The Charge at the Ordination of William I. Chamberlain as Missionary to India.

BY REV. JACOB CHAMBERLAIN, D.D.

IN complying with the request of the Classis of New Brunswick that I should be the one to give the charge to you to-day, I find so many memories crowding upon me, so many conflicting emotions filling my mind, so many joyous anticipations taking possession of my soul, that I find it difficult to choose fitting words with which to fulfil the pleasing duty that is laid upon me.

For memory takes me back at a single step over the intervening space, as I so vividly recall the scene when, just twenty-seven years ago, my much loved Hebrew preceptor, since then your venerated College President, gave similar words of counsel when he preached the sermon at my ordination as a missionary to India, and joined then in laying hands of consecration on my head, as he has now done on yours.

Twenty-seven years of blessed service for the Master! How packed with labors and with joys! For, in looking back over these years of missionary service, it is not the hardships and trials, but the blessings and the joys that fill my vision, and to this blessed heritage of service for the Master do I now bid you welcome with unfeigned gladness.

And what should be the spirit with which you enter upon this life service for Christ in India? What should be your highest aspiration? What shall give you surest success, your supremest joy in that work?

I desire to place before you in this solemn hour as at once your highest aim and your most potent weapon, "Personal Conformity to the Image Christ."

Paul, in the eighth chapter of Romans, declares that we are called of God "to be conformed to the image of His Son," and he speaks of this as a growing conformity, as in the third chapter of Second Corinthians, where he says "we are changed into the same image from glory to glory." And the beloved John tells us what shall be the consummation, when he says in his first epistle, third chapter, "When He shall appear we shall be like Him."

This becoming conformed to the image of Christ is a gradual process. The change begins with regeneration. That is indeed instantaneous. It is then that the germ of conformity to the image of Christ is implanted, but unless it grows it remains but a germ. Regeneration is instantaneous. Sanctification is progressive. And as we grow in the grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ we grow into conformity to His image.

For this growth in conformity to His image the continual aid of the Holy Spirit is absolutely necessary, but it also requires persistent and earnest personal effort on the part of the believer, and to such effort after personal conformity to the image of Christ would I now seek to incite you more and more as you enter upon your life of service for Him.

Such growth into Christ's pattern is not easy work It is not, with most of us, an uninterrupted growth. There is sometimes even retrogression, and we become disheartened and think we can never attain, and are almost ready to give up trying.

I have thought of this struggle to imitate the Divine pattern as I have stood watching the slow weaving of those beautiful India rugs which, when completed, are so much sought after and so highly prized.

India rugs are all the products of painstaking, long continued hand labor, requiring closest watchfulness at every step, lest the figure be not perfect. I have often stood watching the workmen and thinking of God's plan in our lives.

The rug, however large it be, is woven in one piece. The warp is stretched vertically upon the simple loom. There is no shuttle. There is no beam. The weaver sits or stands facing the perpendicular warp. The only light in the room is from a window behind the weaver, shining over his shoulders full upon the growing rug before him. With deft fingers he runs in the different colored woollen yarns into the warp in front of him, and with a heavy wooden comb combs it down to its place, and with hand shears clips off the too long protruding yarn. As you stand behind his back and at one side out of his light watching him, he goes on, apparently forgetful of your presence, chanting to himself from memory the pattern he is weaving in as he swiftly inserts the threads, "six black, three brown, five red, seven white," and so on, as the hours go by. Now and then as he completes a figure or part of one he steps back to take a look and see if it is perfect; but, alas, he has made a slip. Some inches down, where he has not been giving due heed, his pattern is marred. Heaving a sigh, he again takes his place and laboriously takes out the last half hour's, or last half day's work, and more carefully builds it over, for it must be perfect or it will not be accepted.

I have looked in one day and the rug seemed progressing finely, but the next there seemed to have been absolute retrogression, so much had been taken out to remedy a just discovered defect; but it goes on to final completion.

I have myself seen one rug six months upon the same loom, and the weavers had been working upon it day by day, and all day long. Orders were on hand that would take them two full years to fill, but the process could not be hurried or defects were sure to creep in.

Sometimes, as you looked in, you would see something out of harmony; you could not tell what it was, but felt that something was wrong. The weaver, too, had discovered it; he carefully studies his pattern, finds where he had gone wrong, toilsomely remedies the defect, and as you step in again the want of harmony has disappeared and the perfect figure greets your gratified view.

May not this be taken as an illustration of God's pattern being interwoven into our lives.

The pattern is glorious; is perfect. But in weaving it into our lives what sad mistakes we sometimes make; how much we have to undo of what we have carelessly done. How often we find something that is out of harmony with God's plan, and yet the peculiar defect of which at first eludes our search. But as we study more closely the Divine image we see at last, by the illuminating influence of the Holy Spirit, where the defect is, and heaving a sigh and seeking more light from over our shoulders, we at last weave in the pattern as God intended it.

And at length under the guiding eye of the Master Workman, our life pattern is "complete in Him."

French imitations of these India rugs are now thrown on the market by the hundred. They are machine woven. The patterns are indeed exact. There is no distortion in any figure, but it is machine perfection. The rugs cannot compare in richness and life with the laboriously hand-made rugs of India, and no one who knows the true India rug will fail to note the difference, and though produced at one-fourth the cost, and sold for one-fourth the price, the demand is still for the more expensive hand-made genuine India rugs.

There is no machinery for producing God's pattern in our lives, for producing "conformity to the image of His Son." It is a slow, laborious hand-work, to be done by each believer as he watchfully follows the Divine guidance in his life. But when this is accomplished how glorious the result, for "when He shall appear we shall be like Him."

Let this, then, be your highest aim, your daily study, your hourly effort, as you enter upon your chosen life's work, and as you join hands with your Jesus in the completion of the work for which He gave His life—even the salvation of the whole race of man, imitate your Master. Do day by day as He would have you do; as He would do in your circumstances, and the result in your own life pattern and in the conversion of those for whom you labor will be glorious.

Waste no time in vain regrets over past failures, or newly discovered faults in the weaving of your life pattern; but in humility asking God's free pardon for the errors of the past; say with the Apostle Paul, "This one thing I do. Forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things that are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

To-day there has sprung up a new relationship between us. For nearly twenty-four years have we been related as father and son. Now I gladly welcome you as a brother-minister of the Lord Jesus Christ. The natural tie can never lessen; but let the new spiritual tie grow stronger and more all controlling, as the Master allows us to be comrades in His glorious war, and brother-ministers of the new Covenant, in that distant land where, God willing, our lives are to be together offered to Him who has bought us with His own precious blood.

Yet bear with me while I reiterate to you the words which Paul the aged used as he exhorted his younger brother in the ministry, his son in the faith, Timothy, when he said:

"Thou, therefore, my son, be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus." "Endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ." "Watch thou in all things. Endure afflictions. Do the work of an evangelist. Make full proof of thy ministry."

For then will you be able to join in Paul's triumphant shout of victory: "I have fought a good fight. I have finished my course. I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day."

My son, my brother, I welcome you to the glorious fellowship of the missionary of the cross of Jesus, our Lord.

On Changing Our Standards.

AS a lay member of the Reformed Dutch Church, I would hesitate to criticize the production of a clergyman upon any purely theological question; but when the right to change our doctrinal standards is seriously advocated, I think the laymen have a right to be heard as well as the ministerial branch of the Church. In your issue of the 12th of May there is an article on that subject, in which many strange ideas are advocated, and others equally strange set forth as postulates, and all, as I think, wholly irreconcilable with the formula in the first article of the Church constitution to which the author must have affixed his signature "sincerely and in good conscience." The entire argument in that article is founded upon the false and mistaken theory, that "the doctrinal standards are a part of the constitution of the Church," and as such amendable under the provisions of that instrument.

The constitution in no part of it sets forth the doctrinal standards of the Church, but they are referred to therein, and obedience thereto is enjoined as contained in the confession of faith and canons of the Church. The proper province and object of a constitution is, not to declare and set forth the fundamental principles of belief and doctrine, but it is simply a system of fundamental rules for the government and administration of the affairs of the Church or other association by which it may be adopted, to carry out the principles of its organization. Entirely administrative in its character, its amendment interferes with the conscience and religious belief of none. On the other hand, as the doctrinal standards are the fundamental principles of belief and doctrine, to which every member of the Church must be presumed to have conscientiously assented when he united therewith, any alteration thereof must necessarily, to a greater or less degree, in proportion to the extent or radicalness of the change, interfere with the conscience or belief of the members, which, as it has been truly said, "is not to be controlled by majorities or minorities."

The article denies that "creeds and confessions are the truth upon which the Church rests," and says, "Organization is first, then a statement of God's truth as believed. The power that makes can unmake." In this postulate, to use a familiar expression, he places "the cart before the horse." Whenever associations of any character are in contemplation, religious or otherwise, their object and purpose are definitely understood. At the meeting for organization the first thing in order is always a declaration of the specific purpose, then follows the resolution and other proceedings for the adoption of a constitution and by-laws to carry out the object of the association. So that the object is primary, the constitution secondary, it then follows that no amendment of the constitution could legally be made to change the character and object of the association. Suppose on the other hand, that the constitution is primary and the object or principle secondary, according to the author's doctrine and that "those who make can unmake," then it will be in the power of a majority to change the entire object and character of an association, and the majority could, for instance, in spite of the protests of a minority, turn a society formed for the promotion of temperance into an association for the encouragement of horse racing or any other object. Once admit the principle that the doctrinal standards of the Church can be changed in any particular, it follows as a necessary consequence that they can in all, and then its entire denominational character is subject to be drawn into the maelstrom of modern anxiety and restlessness for change and novelty.

The Liturgy to a certain extent presents a different question. That embraces the forms prescribed in conducting different services of the Church, some being compulsory, some voluntary. So far as they are mere formula, they are undoubtedly subject to change, modification or addition. But so far as they are declaratory or recitals of the doctrinal standards of the Church, as established in the canons and confession of faith, they must be truthful and not subject to alteration. A change of doctrinal standard which cannot be made directly cannot be made indirectly by change of liturgy.

As God's truth is the same yesterday, to-day and forever, the necessity of amending its declaration is not apparent.

....“THE KING'S TREASURE HOUSE.” A Romance of Ancient Egypt. By Wilhelm Walloth. From the German, by Mary J. Safford. The time of this story is during the Hebrew bondage, and Jewish characters occupy the author's chief attention. The manners and customs of the ancient Egyptians are pictured after the style of the lamented Ebers. No sacred names appear among the personages, and the incidents are of the most sensational character, so that the general effect of the work is excellent. We commend it as a “study” of Mosaic days and of the people who were led from their degradation and slavery into the light and liberty of a great nationality. (William S. Gottsberger.)

....“THE OLIVE LEAF”. By Hugh Macmillan, D D. This volume takes its name from the opening paper, which sets forth the various suggestions made by the “leaf pluckt off,” which Noah's dove bore in her mouth on returning to the ark. It is a fair specimen of all that follow. The author has a keen eye for all the analogies that obtain between the natural and the spiritual, and great ease and skill in stating them in a graceful and expressive style. He does not deal in dogma nor in exegesis, and in these respects makes no addition to our literature, but he widens our view of the outside world, and sets old truth in a new light by happy illustrations from the realm of nature. There is novelty and freshness in every paper, yet these qualities do not seem to have been laboriously sought for, but rather to have sprung from the fine imagination and cultivated taste of the writer. (Macmillan & Co.)

....“KING ARTHUR.” Not a Love Story. By the author of “John Halifax, Gentleman,” etc. By the most refined delicacy several very unattractive phases of human life are exposed in this book. We could not suppress the wish that the alleged facts were fiction, and that they had happened elsewhere than in this country. The story is instructive, and is told with that fascinating elegance characteristic of Miss Mulock, and that commends all her works to the popular taste. (Harper & Brothers.)

....“FROLIC LEFT OUT; or, Country Children,” by Mrs. M. F. Butts, will undoubtedly interest the little folk who have enjoyed the earlier volumes of “Frolic Stories,” even though Frolic is not a very prominent character in this story. This pleasant account of the doings of some of her country friends will be found quite as entertaining as any of the sprightly narratives which have preceded; and the excellent counsel with which the book abounds is so wisely presented that it can hardly fail to receive the attention which it merits. (Am. Tract Society.)

....John B. Alden has been doing good service in some of his recent publications. One of these is entitled “THE WISDOM AND ELOQUENCE OF DANIEL WEBSTER,” being a compilation of weighty and eloquent passages from his principal speeches and debates, legal arguments and speeches to juries, diplomatic and official papers, and miscellaneous letters. The compiler, Callie L. Bonney, has done her work judiciously; and the book is a most valuable presentation of our great orator and statesman in his most inspired and felicitous moments. It will be found an admirable handy volume of selections for the sprouting orators of our schools. The volume has a portrait of the “godlike,” though not the best one.

Another is the publication, in neat form, of three of “MACAULAY'S BIOGRAPHICAL ESSAYS,” namely: Lord Bacon, Warren Hastings, and William Pitt.

We cannot approve as highly the republication of Canon Farrar's chapters on “INSPIRATION” in the “Ezevir” Library.

Some amusement will be derived from Dr. James E. Rankin's verses on “YE OLD PILGRIMS TO YE NEW,” also reproduced by Mr. Alden.

....“LIGHT ON THE HIDDEN WAY.” This is the experience of an amateur medium who holds constant intercourse with spirits invisible to souls not as finely tempered as her own. Rev. James Freeman Clark gives an introduction, in which he says that the writer's friends regard her as “sincere, truthful and conscientious.” We are hardly satisfied with Dr. Clark's endorsement, as the same words may be used of many patients in insane asylums who “see visions and dream dreams.” The book is written in a tender, pleasant way, and yet gives not the slightest comfort to mourners, except the few who are willing to trust “mediums” rather than take the simple comforts of a Divine revelation. (Ticknor & Co.)

....“RALPH WESTON'S SECRET; or, Unto the Fourth Generation,” by C. S. M., exhibits with a good deal of power one of the saddest and most troublesome phases of intemperance—the growth of hereditary appetite. The fact is too well attested to need proof, but as the importance of the fact is often underrated in considering particular cases, such illustrative narratives as the one presented in this book serve a useful purpose. The subject is treated in a calm, thoughtful and convincing way, and although the story is necessarily a sad one, it is so life-like that it easily secures and holds the reader's attention. (Pres. Board of Publication.)

....Chapter XII. of Mr. Ruskin's autobiography, “PRÆTERITA,” concludes the first volume and brings the narrative to his twentieth year. Among the moulding and inspiring influences to which this chapter alludes are his reading of Dr. Samuel Johnson, and his lessons in art under Copley-Fielding. He begins to write on art, and prepares for Blackwood what afterwards appeared as the first chapter of “Modern Painters,” but was withheld at Turner's request. He takes more journeys at home and abroad, has some more love affairs, and receives an abiding realization of death by the early decease of several of his young friends. (John Wiley & Sons.)

....“ACTORS AND ACTRESSES OF GREAT BRITAIN AND THE UNITED STATES.” Edited by Brander Matthews and Laurence Hutton. This is the first of a series which will extend to perhaps five volumes. It is devoted to Garrick and his contemporaries, and contains sketches of fourteen of the noted actors and actresses of the eighteenth century. The latter were as famous for their immoralities as for their histrionic powers, and give point to the severe criticism which has constantly assailed women on the stage. The editors have done their work admirably, just giving a general statement and then adding passages from writers who personally knew the actors. The book is bound in more gaudy style than suits our taste, but the contents are well printed. (Cassell & Co.)

Our Library Table.

Periodicals, Serials and Notes.

....St Nicholas, always entertaining as well as instructive, appears to good advantage in the July number. The frontispiece, which accompanies an article on La Fayette, represents that famous son of France seated at table in company with a British ambassador. “Fly-fishing for Trout,” “The Last Cruise of the Slug,” “Captain Jack's Fourth-of-July Kite,” and “Ready for Business,” seem intended especially for the pleasure and profit of the boys, while “Nan's Revolt,” “Aunt Deborah's Lesson,” and other stories will more particularly interest their sisters. “The Wonders of the Alphabet” invite the attention of every one. Long live St. Nicholas!

....The Forum for July continues to present its usual collection of well-written and seasonable essays. The most striking article is entitled Confessions of an Episcopalian. President Seely furnishes an able argument on the question, Should the State Teach Religion? and Mr. Round relates some instructive experiences with criminals. “The Manuscript Market,” by Jun. Hen. Browne contains some very useful suggestions for all who propose to live by literature. “Civil Service Reform” is well sustained by George W. Green. The number concludes with a spicy discussion of the question whether foreign authors should be protected, by Mr. Lathrop and Mr. Sherman.

....The Methodist Review for July opens with an account of Bishop Scott with a fine portrait. Then comes a clever paper by Bishop Hurst on the Parsis of India. The Rev. Mr. Seaman tells in excellent temper of the Episode in New York Methodist History made by the independent body which for a generation followed Mr. Stilwell. Dr. Curry gives an entertaining sketch of what he calls a Curious Christological Speculation, viz, the controversy concerning the Kenosis. The Editorial Miscellany is as usual well filled. Its criticisms are able and candid, though the editor seems to us to do less than justice to Dr. Conn's book on Evolution, a very rare volume for insight, comprehensiveness and discrimination.

....The New Englander discusses in two excellent papers Women in the English Universities, and Archæological Study in Athens. There are two articles on Emerson, one of which, treating of his Christian Idealism, anticipates general concurrence ultimately in Mr. Alcott's opinion that the Concord philosopher will be “taken by the hand among all Christians as a brother,” which is stretching the mantle of charity till it tears. The other rebukes the Concord worshippers, and criticizes with point Emerson's disjointed and inconsecutive style of writing, a style which is not only a difficult staccato, but often incorrect and even clumsy, “and there is a visible feeling after epigrams that do not always come.” The number also contains a fine essay by S. W. Duffield on the great Latin hymn, Veni Sancte Spiritus, and its obscure or forgotten author.

....The June number of the Popular Science Monthly was filled with valuable papers, the July number is not inferior to it. Mr. Wells adds the fourth instalment of his important Economic Study of Mexico. Much attention has been paid in Japan to earthquakes, and Mr. John Milne, who has been engaged in the observations, has written a book on the phenomena investigated, the methods of observation and the results; an illustrated summary of what he has written has a place in this number. A valuable economic article is that entitled an Experiment in Silk Culture, by Margarette W. Brooks, which opens a new industry to women. A paper likely to occasion considerable discussion is on Geological Climate in High Latitudes, by C. B. Warring, Ph.D., and is an admirable scientific treatment of the theme. The consideration of The Origin and Structure of Meteorites, written for the Revue des Deux Mondes, appears here in an English rendering. The portrait is that of Gerard Mercator and the customary brief biography follows on subsequent pages. The editor writes with his usual independence upon Science and the State, prompted by the propositions now before Congress to consolidate the Scientific bureaus and to reduce appropriations. These are but a moderate proportion of the useful and timely essays which occupy the pages of the current issue of this periodical.

...The July Century offers to the reader a varied and enjoyable feast. Persons fond of field sports will be delighted with “Cross-Country Riding in America,” or “Riding to Hounds on Long Island,” and “Homing Pigeons,” both attractively illustrated. “Two Runaways” is a laughable plantation story of the days of slavery in the South. Two crayon portraits of Frank R. Stockton, the author of “The Lady, or The Tiger?” accompany a pleasant sketch of his life. In the War series, Maria Blunt gives “Recollections of Shepherdstown During Antietam Week;” Captain Beverley Kennon describes “Fighting Farragut Below New Orleans;” Commander Albert Kautz relates “Incidents of the Occupation of New Orleans;” and Marion A. Baker, the Mayor's Private Secretary, tells of “Farragut's Demands for the Surrender of New Orleans.” These are all well written papers, and equal in interest any of the series.

....The Chelsea Pensioners, engraved from a painting by W. H. Weatherhead, in the exhibition for 1886 of the Royal Institute, is the frontispiece of the Magazine of Art for July. The pictures in the Royal Academy show and the Grosvenor Gallery of 1886 are very pleasantly described under Current Art, and the most notable are presented by engravings. The Old Charterhouse, London, soon to disappear, is preserved by the text of Mr. Basil Champneys and the illustrations of Mr. Joseph Pennell. Nicolas Sobko gives a sketch of the life and a critical examination of the paintings of Basil Peroff, a Russian artist, who gives expression in his works to the melancholy undertone of Russian life. H. L. Spencer conducts the reader along the St. John River, and what he writes is made more impressive by four illustrations. The specimens of East Indian Wood Carving, selected from those of the Colonial Exhibition, described by words and pictures, are instructive and attractive to all interested in interior decoration. Under Greek Art a nearly full-page engraving represents a Restoration of the interior of the Temple of Athenê Parthenos. A full page is given to an engraving of Doves, a girl and a dove, from a painting by Alfred Seifert. The number is fresh, dealing with topics of general interest, and the illustrations seem to us unusually engaging.

....In Babyhood for July, Marion Harland continues her familiar talks with mothers on a topic that every mother should know something about, namely, “Artificial Foods.” Henry Dwight Chapin, M D., treats of “The Value of Water in Early Life,” and John H. Ripley, M D., writes “Concerning the Choice of Summer Resorts.” “The Mother's Parliament,” “Nursery Problems” and “Nursery Helps and Novelties” are all suggestive, to say nothing of other interesting features of this number. This excellent magazine way well be esteemed invaluable to mothers, or to any whose duties are in the nursery.

Discoveries in Central Asia.

PROF. N. N. VESELOFFSKY has conducted researches partly in the environs of Samarkand, partly in the northern districts of Khokand, around Numengan and Chust. In the environs of Samarkand the ruins of Afrasiab have been particularly searched, and amongst the many interesting discoveries made I may mention numerous and important inscriptions dating from the pre Islamitic period, and throwing considerable light upon the doings of Alexander the Great in Transoxania, as well as upon the epoch of Buddhism in Central Asia. The discovery of fine and varied glass vessels deserves particular mention, the fabrication of glass being long ago absolutely unknown in Central Asia—further, clay figures of men and animals, bright colored coffins bearing inscriptions and engravings, a large number of old coins, and many other things belonging to the hitherto entirely hidden antiquity of Central Asia. Central Asia had become a large field of ruins even previous to the eruption of Moslem fanatics. Nobody doubts that archæological researches will be rich in surprising results, and that our notions of the ethnology of the Aryan race will undergo an essential change. —A. Vambery, in The Athenæum.

Books to Read.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK recommends to the general reader the following list of books, which may be of use as a guide to the readers of the INTELLIGENCER:

Translations into English of the classical and French and German works can be had. Almost any bookseller can obtain them. Mr. Richard Brinkerhoff, Synod's Rooms, 34 Vesey street, New York city, will obtain any of them.

The list has been criticized pretty sharply, but is a good one. No two men would probably agree on a list. At all events it is useful to know what are the recommendations of Sir John Lubbock, so much talked and written about. R.

The Scriptorium of the Monastery.

IN the days of King John people had so little idea of the possibility of the printing press, that they were almost equally ignorant of such a material as paper for literary purposes. Yet it is a huge mistake which has not yet been exploded, as it ought to be, that reading and writing were rare accomplishments in the thirteenth century. Knowledge of a certain kind was disseminated far more effectively and far more universally than is generally believed. The country parson was expected to be the schoolmaster of his parish, and generally was so, and there was hardly a village in England during the reign of Henry III. in which there were not one or more persons who could write a clerkly hand, draw up accounts in Latin, and keep the records of the various petty courts and gatherings that were continually being held, sometimes to the annoyance and grievous vexation of the rural population. The professional writers were so numerous, and their training so severe, that they had got for themselves privileges of a very exceptional kind; the clerk took rank with the clergyman, and the writer of a book was almost as much esteemed as its author. The scriptorium of a great monastery was at once the printing press and the publishing office. It was the place where books were written, and whence they issued to the world. With the traditional exclusiveness of the earlier monasteries there was less desire, no doubt, to diffuse and disperse than to accumulate books, but the composing and the multiplication of books was always going on. The scriptorium was a great writing school, too, and the rules of the art of writing which were laid down there were so rigidly adhered to that to this day it is not difficult to decide at a glance whether a book was written at St. Alban's or St. Edmund's Abbey. Sometimes as many as twenty writers were employed at once, and besides these there were occasionally supernumeraries who were professional scribes, and who were paid for their services; but nothing short of perfect penmanship, such trained skill, for instance, as would now be required of an engraver, would qualify a copyist to take part in the finished work which the copying of important books required. —The Quarterly Review.

False Complexions.

WE do not judge of men's complexion by the color they have when they sit before the fire. If all were truly good who are occasionally, good men would not be scarce. See how people weep under a moving sermon. Think not, therefore, that their hearts are changed, for even marble drips in certain weathers. A man fresh from a revival meeting looks like a zealous Christian; but see him when he goes to market. As a face reddened by the fire soon loses all its ruddiness, so do numbers lose all their godliness. Lord, let me never be what I cannot be forever. Give me a complexion which I shall wear all my lifetime, and when time shall be no more.—Spurgeon.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT SOAP.

We think that an experience of 80 years entitles us to speak with intelligence and authority on the subject of soap.

Our business was established in New York City in 1806, and we still occupy the same premises. It is now the oldest firm of its kind in New York, if not in the United States.

We have for many years supplied a very large number of the oldest and best families of this city with our Laundry Soap. Many of these families have used no other soap for generations. They are people who can appreciate and will have only the best of everything. We probably have more of this class of trade than any other house in the United States. The reason of this is that we have always tried to furnish the best and most economical soap that could be produced.

The soap we speak of has been so long and thoroughly tested, and has given such universal satisfaction, that we have now decided to introduce it throughout the country generally.

When we first began business, adulterated soaps were unknown. Soaps differed in quality, according to the quality of stock of which they were made, but they were all pure—and no one thought of putting in soap anything but tallow, rosin, and enough alkali to form a perfect combination. Of late years, however, the demand for labor-saving and cheap soaps has led to the adulteration of this, as well as of so many other necessary articles. To such an extent is this practised that it is now difficult for families to buy a really good article of soap.

No soap can be made to save labor and sell at a low price without containing sal-soda, strong alkali, and other ingredients which injure and rapidly wear out clothing, bed and table linen, etc. This is one of the principal reasons that has led us to introduce an unadulterated, old-fashioned "LAUNDRY" SOAP. As this soap differs from other styles, we mention some of its

MERITS and PECULIARITIES.

1st.—It is absolutely pure, not a grain or atom of adulteration in it; and contains nothing that is not necessary to a perfect soap.

2d.—Because it is pure it does not as a matter of fact wash away more slowly, and will do more work than other soaps. This has been demonstrated by numerous tests.

3d.—While it will not save "time" and "labor," it will save many dollars' worth of clothes, acting as it does as a preservative, and not as a destroyer of the linen washed with it.

4th.—It contains no sal-soda, no silicate, no filling of any sort, nor any strong chemicals that can possibly injure the clothing or skin, and can therefore safely be used as a toilet soap.

5th.—Considering its absolute purity and unequalled quality, it is positively the cheapest soap any consumer rich or poor can buy.

6th.—It is made only of those materials which, when combined, make the best laundry soap, regardless of the appearance of the soap itself. It is therefore not the most attractive looking of soaps, but the very best for use.

7th.—After 80 years' experience we cannot manufacture or recommend a better soap for all laundry purposes.

1st.—When confined in boxes it has a peculiar tendency to "sweat" or become moist. This is owing to the absence of those chemicals which, while making soap dry, greatly injure the clothing. For this reason the soap is not wrapped. Expose the soap to the air and it will dry rapidly and become very hard.

2d.—It will warp, shrink, and twist with age. Its appearance is also somewhat mottled and streaked. These conditions are unavoidable in a pure soap. By adding sal-soda or other materials the soap can be made lighter in color and will retain its shape and also present a more handsome and brilliant appearance, but all these beautifying additions injure the clothing.

3d.—While it washes quickly and thoroughly it will not remove dirt in as rapid a manner as the "labor-saving" and "time-saving" soaps or powders. This is because it contains no excessively strong acids or alkalies which, while they remove the dirt easily and quickly, at the same time eat into and rot the clothing.

4th.—It appears to be an expensive soap when compared with other cakes of the same size. This is because only the best and purest materials that money can purchase are used in its composition, and nothing is added that can injure the clothing in the slightest degree.

We guarantee the truth of these statements, which are in no respect exaggerated or used for advertising effect. The object of making this soap is to furnish families with as perfect a soap as can be made, and one that they can feel assured is absolutely pure and cannot injure the clothing.

AUNT MARJORIE'S CORNER

I Could Not Say Come Back.

BY PRISCILLA J. OWEN.

THE death angel brought me a crown and a sorrow,
The crown for my darling, the sorrow was mine.
Each day swept my heart with a "Lonely to-morrow,"
Till it seemed that the sun had forgotten to shine.

Then I dreamed that I stood in the heavenly doorway,
My darling beside me, her hand in my own,
Her head on my shoulder, and spreading before me
The ranks of bright angels were ranged to God's throne.

All solemn in glory, all beauteous in splendor,
With peace on their foreheads and joy in their eyes,
And their love-lighted faces beamed softly and tender,
And I heard a sweet whisper of "welcome" arise.

While conscious of rapture, I gazed on their faces,
I felt the hand loosened I clasped in my own,
All softly she stepped along the bright spaces,
While the angels made way as she knelt at the throne.

And my eyes filled with tears as I gazed on that glory,
And the pinions of splendor closed over her track,
For I stood all alone in the heavenly doorway,
But I would not, I could not, say "Darling, come back."

Then I waked; 'twas a dream of those mansions elysian,
That God in His mercy had suffered to come;
I shall see her again, it will not be a vision,
So I am contented, though longing for home.

The Two Homes.

An Allegory.

BY MRS. C. H. POLHEMUS.

A POOR man once lived in a wretched hovel which was very poorly built and an uncomfortable abode during heavy storms. He felt that his house was a miserable dwelling, a slight thing which a strong wind could overthrow and carry away, but he had not the ability to provide a better.

One day while he was thinking of his unhappy condition and wondering what he should do if his house were destroyed, he saw a handsome equipage coming toward him and a person clothed in the richest garments sitting therein. The poor man said, "This must be the king. I will run out, bow before him, and show him reverence." But when he observed the grandeur, dignity and authority of the king's manner, he was afraid and dared not. The king saw him, and looked with such compassion upon him that the poor man felt reassured and ran out and bowed before him.

With accents of tenderest sympathy the king said to him, "It is my desire that all my subjects should be very happy, and I am willing to do anything to provide for their comfort. Are you happy? Have you any necessities which I can relieve?" With great amazement at the gracious manner in which the king addressed one of the lowest of his subjects, the poor man answered: "Oh, master, how wonderful is thy kindness! I was just now thinking about the dark future which awaits me. I have a miserable hovel for my home. One which has been threatened with destruction many times during the severe storms which sweep over this country, and if my house is destroyed, I know not whither to go or what will become of me."

The king said, "If you will become my loyal subject, obey all my commands, serve me faithfully and love me fervently as long as you live, I will have a beautiful mansion prepared for you which shall never be destroyed, and which will never be taken from you, and which you shall inhabit as soon as this house is unfit for a dwelling. You must do nothing to hasten the destruction of your present home, but must take good care of it and wait patiently until I send my servants to convey you to your new mansion. Here is a book which I give you to teach you what my commands are and how to obey them. Study it carefully.

The poor man promised to fulfil all the requirements to the best of his ability, and the king departed. Before he went to sleep that night the poor man's mind was filled with love toward the great, wise and wonderful king who had condescended to notice and interest himself in his welfare. Thinking of the new home promised him, he fell into a sweet, peaceful sleep, and dreamed that he crossed a river and entered a country of marvellous beauty. The trees were enormous and of great variety. Their foliage was dense and of the richest green. The grass resembled the finest velvet and was densely beset with flowers of the most delicate colors and exquisite forms. The air was pure and exhilarating and loaded with perfume from the innumerable flowers. There was no sun to be seen, but a rich, golden light pervaded the whole landscape and bathed up the mountain peaks in the distance, and there were no shadows in the valleys between. Strains of the sweetest music burst upon his ear. After listening awhile he saw a number of persons approaching him, dressed in dazzling white and singing as they glided on. Unperceived, he watched them pass, and then continued his journey without any feeling of fatigue, but seemed to be borne up as if on wings. All at once a magnificent city appeared in sight. Pinnacles of splendid buildings glittered in the light as if covered with gold. The centre of the city seemed the most beautiful, for there appeared to be a great and glorious Presence which shed a radiance over all. Myriads of shining beings were kneeling and filling the air with such music as it would be impossible to describe. The man said to himself, "This must be the palace of the king," and then he awoke.

The next morning his thoughts were filled with the dream. He looked around his dwelling and it seemed all the more miserable after the glimpse of glory he had seen in his dreams, and doubts entered his mind. "Could it be possible that one so glorious as the great king really cared for such as he, so poor and lowly?" This thought distressed him greatly, but then he remembered that the king had given him a book to help, guide, and comfort him, so he opened it and read, "He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, to set them among princes, and to make them inherit the throne of glory." Then he thought, "can there really be such a beautiful home awaiting me as I saw in my dreams last night?" He turned over the pages of the book and read, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which the King hath prepared for them that love him."

Hope filled his heart after reading these sweet promises, and he went about his work very happy. He resolved to do all he could for the king while he had an opportunity, so he told others what great things the king had done for him and urged them to become loving and dutiful subjects. He explained to them the "wonderful words of life" written in his book, warning them of the punishment which should be inflicted upon them if they would not obey the king, and then encouraging them with the promises of great reward if they would obey.

The more he worked for the king the more he loved him, and he became constantly happier in his service and in contemplating the blissful future.

Years passed and the hovel became so ruinous that it was no longer fit for habitation; so one beautiful spring morning, as its occupant was reading from the book which had grown more precious to him every year, "For we know that when the house of this earthly tabernacle is dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens," some of the king's servants came to him and gently carried him out of his home to the beautiful mansion all in readiness for him. There he beheld the king in his beauty and saw him face to face. He joined in the loud hallelujahs of praise and worship which millions of glorious and happy beings were rendering to the king. He was gladly welcomed by all his loved ones who had preceded him to the kingdom of light. The king had promised that their happiness should be everlasting, that he would wipe all tears from the eyes of his people, that "they should hunger no more, neither thirst any more, that there should be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither any more pain, for the former things had passed away," so they had no fears for the future. The man was no longer poor, but richer and happier than any earthly monarch. He knew then that he had not seen "a half of that city's bright glory" in his dreams, that earthly minds cannot imagine nor comprehend anything of the beauty of the many mansions, nor conceive of the happiness of dwelling in perfect communion with the king.

Would he not have been a very foolish man if he had been unwilling to leave his miserable dwelling on earth to be conveyed to the mansion prepared for him?

Adulteration of Fruit Jellies.

THE following from the pen of one who speaks with authority, both as a physician and by reason of official position, will be read with interest by those who are tempted to purchase "bargains" in cheap jellies.

Good housewives know that fruit jellies are made as follows: Juice of fruit freshly expressed; white sugar a sufficiency; boil some time, strain, and cool rapidly.

Every retail grocer has upon his shelves a quantity of currant and other fruit jellies which, from their extreme cheapness, ought to excite suspicion. About two years ago my attention was first called to these goods by the complaint of an anxious mother to the Health Department to the effect that some jelly her children had eaten "had made them sick."

I examined the little ones, three in number, ranging in age from two to five years, and found them suffering from diarrhœa and vomiting, evidently caused by some irritating matter in their digestive organs. The mother said that their grandmother, an indulgent old lady, had given them each the day before a little miniature cup of currant jelly purchased at a neighboring fruit-stand. Inquiry at this stand elicited the fact that the jelly had been manufactured at a preserve factory in East Fifth street.

An inspection of this factory was made, and the manufacturer was caught in the act of preparing a lot of "currant" jelly. These were the ingredients he used: Dried apples; water; low-grade glucose; tartaric acid; arsenical fuchsine (a red aniline color).

To this mixture was added a sufficient quantity of French glue to give it the consistency of jelly. A large package of salicylic acid was also found stowed away in a cupboard, which, after some pressure had been brought to bear on him, the proprietor admitted he used in warm weather "to keep his jellies from spoiling." All these goods were seized and destroyed on account of the arsenical fuchsine used to color them. Their owner was warned that a repetition of his offence would be followed by arrest. (The courts are disposed to deal so leniently by first offenders that we rarely arrest for first offence.)

This case led to a thorough inspection of all the jelly factories in this city, and nearly all were found manufacturing similar goods.

The use of poisonous fuchsine was prohibited, as was also salicylic acid. Gelatine was substituted for glue where manufacturers were found using the latter substance, but the manufacture of jelly is now carried on thus: Dried apples; water; glucose; tartaric acid; carmine or aniline sugar-red; gelatine; mix, boil, and strain.

The above formula produces an imitation currant jelly. The other fruit jellies are made by diminishing the amount of tartaric acid, substituting for red color the brown of burnt sugar, and adding the artificial flavoring essence of the desired fruit.

It is difficult to condemn this, when freshly made, on sanitary grounds. It is a fraud on the public at best, and the manufacturers of it should be compelled to print on the label describing the goods a full list of the ingredients used. In warm weather it is apt to decompose on account of the gelatine, and then it becomes dangerous.

The red adulterated jellies may be easily detected by a few simple tests of their coloring matters: Dilute the suspected jelly with one half its bulk of water in a glass test-tube; then add an equal amount of strong aqua ammonia. This chemical changes the color of natural fruit reds to a darkish green, intensifies the reds of cochineal and carmine, and does not affect aniline "sugar-red." Fuchsine, the red aniline commonly used, is decolorized by the ammonia.

But a better method of testing for fuchsine would be to immerse in the jelly a few threads of white silk or wool, which will be colored pink by it, but not by the natural colors proper to pure jellies.—Cyrus Edson, M.D., in Babyhood.

Left Water Pots.

"I SOMEHOW get a bigger blessing when I make a sacrifice to go to a meeting," said Mrs. Giles to me one day recently, and immediately the Sunday-school lesson came to mind and I said more to myself than to her, "A left water pot."

In the ceaseless whirl of activities in which most of our lives are cast we cannot attempt everything, and as Mrs. Whitney has said, "Something must be crowded out." The choice oftener rests with us than we think or are willing to think. We can leave some things, if we will. I doubt not that to the woman of Samaria hers was quite as an important errand as any of ours, and yet it was left, self-forgotten, when the Divine command was uttered, "go call." Her steps would have been greatly retarded had she endeavored to carry the stone water jar as she hurried back to the village. It seems to me that is the trouble with some of us; our service is burdened with too many selfish projects, we are not content to leave our water pots and then go, and we merit oftener than we think the self-accusing words, "these ye ought to have done, and not to leave the other undone." With comforting assurance do we remember the promise, "The Holy Ghost shall teach you," else "who is sufficient for these things."

The measure of our blessing is proportionate to the cost of our sacrifice; the reward is "an hundred fold now in this time and in the world to come eternal life."

What hast thou left for me?"

IT is by ever and anon ascending up to God, by rising through prayer into a loftier, purer region, for supplies of Divine grace, that he maintains his spiritual life. Prevent these animals from rising to the surface, and they die for want of breath; prevent him from rising to God, and he dies from want of prayer. Let me breathe, says a man gasping, or else I die! "DOMESTIC CYCLOPEDIA OF PRACTICAL INFORMATION." It is in the interest of housekeepers that Aunt Marjorie begs attention to the excellent manual of information about every-day affairs which bears the title above given. It contains brief but admirable articles on such topics as bathing, drainage, food, exercise, diet, ventilation, water, treatment in cases of accident, surgical appliances, simple remedies, the home medicine chest, nursing, care of children, weights and measures, etc. Not usurping the place of your favorite cookery book, it contains a variety of excellent receipts, some of which have been personally tested by the present writer, and in every instance with gratifying success.

Books of reference on literary, scientific or historical subjects are simply indispensable to the student, condensing as they do in a few terse sentences the spoils of many libraries. Equally convenient and almost essential to the housekeeper who desires to order home affairs without needless jars in the machinery, the "Domestic Cyclopedia" is a treasury of facts, formulas and suggestions, systematically grouped and available at a moment's notice. To the young wife making her first essays in the guidance of a household, this book will come like a friendly companion, whose presence in the house will be welcome in all weathers and seasons. (C. Calves of the Stall.

"Ye shall go forth and grow up (or gambol) as calves of the stall."—MALACHI 4:2.

"I WANT you to see the calves!" exclaimed my father one morning, entering the room in which I was sitting. They had come from the West—eighty in number—to my uncle's extensive farm, and the first floor of his largest barn had been made ready for them. This barn was two miles away, so we rode to it in our carriage. We reached it just at their dinner-time, so they were all at home, and stood in an attitude of expectation when the barn door opened to admit us.

Each calf was in a separate stall; forty to the right of us, forty to the left of us. We passed between the two long rows, stroking the heads and necks of the pretty gentle creatures, while we pleasantly talked with their keeper. We then returned home, while their keeper patiently waited for them to finish their noonday repast that he might afterward send them forth to gambol in the pleasant meadows beside the running brooks. With such daily care they were to thrive and grow and become well fitted for their owner's service. How much better off than if they had been left to grow up on the plains and cattle ranges of the West!

Have you read the stories told by Broncho John, a herdman of the West? For fifteen years, ever since he was a boy twelve years of age, he is said to have followed every cattle trail from the Gulf of Mexico to the mountains of Washington Territory. Mounted on his mustang (prairie horse), with spurs, and lasso (rope with noose), and sombrero (broad-brimmed hat), he has doubtless guided and guarded numerous herds of cattle through many dangerous passes and lonely trails, quieted them after fearful stampedes and conducted them safely across streams, often at the risk of his own life. I have come to think of him as a valuable herdman and a valiant knight, having for his motto:

"There's nothing so kingly as kindness,
And nothing so royal as truth."

I am interested in his work, but far more in his fellow-workers, of whom he tells us there are between 8,000 and 10,000 in the ranges of the cattle-raising region. They are, he assures us, a class of brave, honest, industrious men, patiently enduring grievous hardships, and deserving of sympathy and help.

The prophet Amos told King Amaziah that he had been a herdman. He had been "among the herd men of Tekoa," a place about twelve miles southeast of Jerusalem, on the borders of the wilderness of Judah.

Broncho John has made me understand why the "calves of the stall" on my uncle's farm are so much more favored than they would be if they had been turned loose in the autumn with the great herds of cattle in Montana, Wyoming and other Territories to seek their food upon the prairies. When the cold winter comes and the great snow storms, the bunch-grass is often covered up under two feet of snow. If the temperature falls soon after to thirty degrees below zero, as it likely will, the tall prairie grass will cease to nourish them. Then what will the starving cattle do? They will rush South, sweep down the homesteads in their way, devour the hay and grass, and then press on, taking the homesteader's herds along with them, and leaving behind only ruin and desolation. There may be twenty or thirty thousand cattle in this stampeding herd. Many will be shot with rifles, but the number will be too great to resist.

A slight cause may start a stampede; for instance, a hail-stone hitting an ox in his eye. Broncho John was one day coming up the Texas trail with a party of herdmen when one of them opened his tobacco-pouch and the wind blew some shreds of the tobacco into an ox's eye. The eye began to smart, and the ox began to start. In ten seconds the whole herd was running. After two days the cattle were controlled, but four hundred had been killed, and two of the best herdmen trampled to death.

When a stampede occurs the herdmen rush their mustangs against the advancing herd, and all ride to the right around it. This is in order to keep the cattle together and get them to running in a circle. Broncho John and a company of herdmen once rode around a herd for two hundred miles, and then found they were only twenty-five miles from the place of starting. These riders had not stopped for even a moment to rest or eat.

There is apt to be very great trouble when the cattle are taken across a stream twenty-five or thirty at a time. The herdman swims his horse along with them, and perhaps all will reach the other side without difficulty. A rabbit may however suddenly appear on the bank when the middle of the stream is reached and frighten one of the oxen, who will at once turn back. Then the whole number will swim round and round and round perhaps for hours, before they can be again started for the shore. Sometimes they drift for miles down the stream, "generally filled with running ice," while "the sun is scorching hot." It has taken a month to get as many as 4,000 cattle across a stream. This swimming around is called "milling;" causing it to cease is "breaking up the mill."

You see how many afflictions these "calves of the stall" have escaped! how many privileges they have enjoyed! No hunger, no fear of evil, no perils on water or land! They have gone forth well-kept and well-fed into green pasture fields to gambol and to grow up to be strong, healthy, active, happy and useful.

Our Bible sentence is a promise for you, dear boys and girls: "Ye shall go forth and grow up (gambol) as calves of the stall." This world is full of dangers. The best guides will not always lead us safely. God alone can do this. If we will give ourselves into His keeping, letting Him own us and protect us and care for us, He will be "our guide forever and ever," and this promise will be ours. He is saying to each of you to-day: "Wilt thou not from this time cry unto me: My Father, thou art the guide of my youth?" Oh, joyfully reply to this loving invitation: "Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel, and afterward receive me to glory!" Then, indeed, may you exclaim:

"We are children, happy children,
Singing, singing, as we go,
'Tis our Father's hand that leads us,
Leads us through this world below."

Stella's Victory.

STELLA VINTON had been down town all alone for the first time in her life to make some purchases for her mother. She had walked down, and was riding home. Mrs. Vinton had told her that she might have five cents for herself if there was any change left, but she had been obliged to spend all but five cents, and was naturally just a little disappointed. She sat in the car with the fare in her hand waiting for the conductor to come for it.

He came along presently, and she held it out toward him, but he did not see it, and went on to the front of the car, then stepped off the front platform, and, waiting a moment, jumped on the rear again.

"He's forgotten me. He is not coming for my fare. I shall have to give it to him when I get out," she thought.

"No, I wouldn't, it is his place to come for it," the Tempter suggested.

"That would be cheating. You have had your ride, and ought to pay for it," whispered Conscience.

"Of course, but it's not my business to make the conductor take it."

"It is everybody's business to be honest."

"Ma promised me five cents, too."

"But she would not like you to get it this way."

"She need never know. I would not tell her."

"But you would know, and Jesus would know, and you profess to be a little Christian."

"So I do, and I will be, and I won't cheat."

Just then the conductor called out Baker street, and Stella Vinton rose to leave the car. As she did so she put the five cents into the conductor's hand.

"Thank you," he said smiling.

Stella went home and told her mother of her temptation.

Mrs. Vinton opened her purse, and taking out a twenty-five cent piece, put it in Stella's hand.

"This is for my honest little girl," she said, kissing her.

So Stella had double reason to be glad that she had gained the victory.—Selected.

The Lament of the Alligator.

"WHAT trouble can be greater,"
Asks a frightened alligator,
"Than has happened to our family of late?
My brothers and my cousins
Have been massacred by dozens;
And, in truth, I fear the same unhappy fate.

"We are now the ruling passion
Of those who follow fashion
Implicitly in every latest craze,
And the money market caters
To this taste for alligators,
And seeks to serve us up in tempting ways.

"What makes the matter worse is—
Besides the bags and purses
Which ingenious wretches make from out our skins,
Besides the boots and slippers—
Our teeth (those pearly nippers)
Are set with gold, and worn as jewelled pins.

"If they catch us young and tender,
Our chances are as slender
As if our precious hides were tough and old;
For they killed my baby sister,
And, before we really missed her,
She was stuffed, and for a paper-weight was sold.

"It fairly makes me shiver,
When I crawl from out the river
To take my sweet siesta in the sun,
To think of all the dangers
We risk from sporting strangers
Who murder us for profit or for fun.

"One day I met a tourist;
His aim was not the surest,
But he hunted me with ardor so intense,
In a momentary madness,
To my everlasting sadness,
I had to eat him up—in self-defence.

"Now it seems that my aggressor
Was an erudite professor,
Engaged in zoological pursuit
Of a lucius crocodilus
(As the scientists may style us),
Just to teach the young idea how to shoot.

"So I might have gone to college
With this man of wondrous knowledge,
And beautified a scientific room,
Where my scaly skin for ages,
In the company of sages,
Would have carefully preserved its youthful bloom."
